Reluct (rē-lukt'), v.t. [L. reluctor—re, back or again, and luctor, to struggle.] To strive or struggle against anything; to make resistance; to show reluctance or aversion.

We with studied mixtures force our relucting appetites, and with all the spells of epicurism, conjure them up, that we may lay them again. Dr. H. More.

Reluctance (rē-luk'tans), n. The state or quality of being reluctant; aversion; repugnance; unwillingness: often followed by to, though sometimes by against.

'Æneas, when forced in his own defence to kill Lausus, the poet shows compassionate, and tempering the severity of his looks with a reluctance to the action. Dryden.

Reluctance against God and his just yoke. Milton.

Reluctancy (rē-luk'tan-si), n. Same as Reluctance.

Bear witness, heav'n, with what reluctancy
Her helpless innocence I doom to die. Dryden.

Reluctant (rē-luk'tant), a. [L. reluctans, reluctantis, ppr. of reluctor. See RELUCT.] 1. Striving against doing something; struggling or resisting with violence.

Down he fell
A monstrous serpent on his belly prone,
Reluctant, but in vain; a greater Power
Now ruled him. Milton.

2. Unwilling to do what one feels called on to do; acting with repugnance; averse; loth; as, he was very reluctant to go.

Reluctant now I touch'd the trembling string. Tickell.

Relume (rē-lūm'), v.t. [See RELUMINE.] To rekindle; to light again.

Yet in thy heart what human sympathies,
What soft compassion, glows, as in the skies
The tender stars their clouded lamps relume. Longfellow.

Relumine (rē-lū'min), v.t. [L. relumino—re, again, and lumen, light, from luceo, to shine.] 1. To light anew; to rekindle.

'When the light of the Gospel was reluminé by the Reformation.' Bp. Louth.—2. To illuminate again. 'Time's reluminé river.' Hood.

Rely (rē-lī'), v.t. pret. & pp. relied; ppr. relying. [From old relie, rely, relye, lit. to rally, from L. re, ad, to, and igare, to bind. It seems to have been originally transitive, and to have been often used with reflexive pronouns. Fitzedward Hall quotes from old authors such passages as: 'Those men who, fearing God, relied themselves upon his word' (1612); 'Not relying ourselves entirely upon him and his salvation' (Bp. Sanderson, 1681); whence the transition to the modern meaning is easy.] To rest with confidence, as when we are satisfied of the veracity, integrity, or ability of persons, or of the certainty of facts or of evidence; to have confidence in; to trust; to depend: with on or upon; as, to rely on the promise of a man who is known to be upright; to rely on the veracity or fidelity of a tried friend; to rely on the mercy and promises of God. 'Bade me rely on him as on my father.' Shak. 'As one relying on your lordship's will.' Shak.

Because thou hast relied on the king of Syria, and not relied on the Lord thy God; therefore is the host of the king of Syria escaped out of thine hand. 2 Chr. xvi. 7.

SYN. To trust, depend, confide, repose.

Remade (rē-mād'), pret. & pp. of remake.

Remain (rē-mān'), v.t. [O. Fr. remanēre, remanoir, from L. remaneo—re, back, and maneo, mansi, to remain, to stay (whence mansion).] 1. To continue in a place; to stay; to abide. 'He should have remained in the city of refuge.' Num. xxxv. 28.—2. To continue in an unchanged form, state, or condition. 'Childless thou art, childless remain.' Milton.

If she depart, let her remain unmarried. 1 Cor. vii. 11.

3. To endure; to continue; to last.

For the upright shall dwell in the land, and the perfect shall remain in it. Prov. ii. 21.

4. To stay behind after others have gone; to be left after a part, quantity, or number has been taken away, removed or destroyed.

And all his fugitives with all his bands shall fall by the sword, and they that remain shall be scattered. Ezek. xvii. 21.

5. To be left as not included or comprised; to be still to deal with.

That a father may have some power over his children is easily granted; but that an elder brother has so over his brethren, remains to be seen. Locke.

Remain is used by Milton and others in some cases transitively:

The easier conquest now remains thee. Par. Lost.

This, however, may be considered as elliptical for remains to thee, as remain is not properly a transitive verb.—SYN. To continue, stay, wait, tarry, rest, sojourn, dwell, abide, last, endure.

Remain (rē-mān'), n. 1.† State of remaining; stay; abode.

A most miraculous work in this good king,
Which, often, since my here-remain in England,
I've seen him do. Shak.

2.† That which is left to be done.

I know your master's pleasure and he mine:
All the remain is 'Welcome!' Shak.

3. That which is left; remainder; relic: chiefly used in the plural. 'Our little *remain*e of victuals.' Sir J. Hawkins. ('Solomon's Proverbs') the most curious and valuable remain of antient wisdom.' Bp. Louth. 'When this remain of horror has entirely subsided.' Burke. 'Their small remain of life.' Pope.

Among the *remain*s of old Rome the grandeur of the commonwealth shows itself chiefly in works that were either necessary or convenient. Addison.

Specifically—4. That which is left of a human being after life is gone; a dead body; a corpse: now only used in the plural.

Be kind to my *remain*s, and O, defend,
Against your judgment, your departed friend! Dryden.

5. pl. The productions, especially the literary works of one who is dead; posthumous works; as, Coleridge's Literary Remains.—Organic remains. See ORGANIC.

Remainder (rē-mān'dér), n. [An O. Fr. infinitive (see REMAIN, v.i.); comp. rejoinder.]

1. That which remains; anything left after the separation, removal, destruction, or passing of a part.

If these decoctions be repeated till the water comes off clear, the remainder yields no salt. Arbuthnot.

What madness moves you, matrons, to destroy
The last *remain*ers of unhappy Troy. Dryden.

2. In arith., &c., the sum or quantity that is left after subtraction or after any deduction.

3. In law, an estate limited to take effect and be enjoyed after another estate, as a life interest, is determined. Thus, if the owner of the fee-simple or freehold of lands give them by will or deed to A for life, and after his decease to B and his heirs, the interest of B is termed the remainder, because, after deducting A's life estate, all that remains belongs to B. Remainders are either vested, contingent, or cross. Vested or executed remainders, are those by which a present interest passes to the party, though it is to be enjoyed in future, and by which the estate is invariably fixed to remain to a determinate person after the particular estate is spent, as if A be tenant for years, remainder to B in fee; hereby B's remainder is vested, which nothing can defeat or set aside. Contingent remainders, otherwise called executory, are defined to be 'where the estate in remainder is limited to take effect either to an uncertain person, or upon an uncertain event; so that the particular estate may chance to be determined, and the remainder never take effect.' Cross remainder is where each of two grantees has reciprocally a remainder in the share of the other. Thus, if an estate be granted as to one half to A for life with remainder to his children in tail, with remainder to B in fee-simple; and as to the other half, to B for life with remainder to his children in tail, with remainder to A in fee-simple, these remainders are called cross remainders.—SYN. Rest, residue, remnant, remains, leavings, relics. Remainder (rē-mān'dér), a. Remaining; refuse; left; as, the remainder viands. 'As dry as the remainder biscuit after a voyage.' Shak.

Remainder-man (rē-mān'dér-man), n. In law, he who has an estate after a particular estate is determined.

Remake (rē-māk'), v.t. pret. & pp. remade; ppr. remaking. To make anew.

As a stream that spouting from a cliff
Falls in mid air, but gathering at the base
Remakes itself and flashes down the vale. Tennyson.

Remand (rē-mand'), v.t. [Fr. remander, from L. re, and mando, to commit to one's charge.] 1. To send, call, or order back; as, to remand an officer from a distant place. 'Remand it to its former place.' South.

When a prisoner first leaves his cell he cannot bear the light of day: he is unable to discriminate colours, or recognise faces. But the remedy is, not to remand him into his dungeon, but to accustom him to the rays of the sun. Macaulay.

2. In law, to send back to jail, as an accused party, in order to give time to collect more evidence against him; to hold over till some future time, as a case in which further evidence is required.

Morgan is sent back into custody, whither also I am remanded. Shoaleet.

Remand (rē-mand'), n. The state of being remanded, recommitted, or held over; the act of remanding.

He will probably apply for a series of remands from time to time, until the case is more complete. Dickens.

'How does your case stand now?' 'Why, sir, it is under remand at present.' Dickens.

Remedy (rēm'e-di), v. t. pret. & pp. remedied; ppr. remedying. [Fr. remédier, from L. remedium, that which heals again—re, again, and medeo, to heal.] 1. To cure; to heal; to restore to soundness or health; as, to remedy a disease.—2. To repair or remove, as some evil; to redress; to counteract; as, to remedy the evils of a war.

Remelt (rēm'elt'), v. t. To melt again.

Remember (rēm'em'bēr), v. t. [O. Fr. remembrer, se remembrer, to call to mind, to remember, from L. L. rememorare—L. re, back or again, and memoro, memorare, to bring to remembrance, from memor, mind-ful.] 1. To bring back again to the memory; to recall to mind; to recollect.

Remember the days of old, consider the years of many generations. Deut. xxxii. 7.

We are said to remember anything, when the idea of it arises in the mind with the consciousness that we have had this idea before. Watts.

I remember, I remember,
The fir trees dark and high. Praed.

2. To bear or keep in mind; to have in memory; to be capable of recalling when required; to preserve unforgetten; as, to remember one's lessons; to remember all the circumstances.—3. To be continually thoughtful of; to have present to the attention; to attend to; not to forget.

Remember what I warn thee; shun to taste. Milton.

4.† To mention.

The ditty does remember my drownd'd father. Shak.

5. To put in mind; to remind.

I'll not remember you of my own lord. Shak.
Grief fills the room up of my absent child,
Puts on his pretty looks, repeats his words,
Remembers me of all his gracious parts. Shak.

6. To think of; to consider; to take into consideration; as, do not blame him too severely, you must remember his weakness.

When I remember thee upon my bed, and meditate upon thee in the night watches. Ps. lxxii. 6.

7. To keep in mind with gratitude, favour, confidence, affection, respect, or any other feeling or emotion. 'If thou wilt indeed look on the affliction of thine handmaid and remember me.' 1 Sam. i. 11. 'Remember the sabbath-day, to keep it holy.' Exod. xx. 8.

Let them have their wages duly paid,
And something over to remember me. Shak.

—Remember, Recollect. Remember implies that a thing exists in the memory, but it does not imply that it is actually present in the thoughts at the moment, but that it recurs without effort. Recollect means that a fact, forgotten or partially lost to memory, is after some effort recalled and before us. Remembrance is the storehouse, recollection the act of culling out this article and that from the repository. He remembers everything he hears, and can recollect any statement when called on. The words, however, are often confounded, and we say we cannot remember a thing when we mean we cannot recollect it.

Remember (rēm'em'bēr), v. i. To have something in remembrance; to exercise the faculty of memory.

I remember
Of such a time: being my sworn servant,
The duke retained him his. Shak.

Rememberable (rēm'em'bēr-a-bl), a. Capable or worthy of being remembered. Coleridge.

Rememberably (rēm'em'bēr-a-bli), adv. In a rememberable manner; so as to be remembered. Southey.

Rememberer (rēm'em'bēr-ēr), n. One that remembers. 'A rememberer of the least good office.' Wotton.

Remembrance (rēm'em'brans), n. [O. Fr. remembrance. See above.] 1. The act of remembering; the keeping of a thing in mind or recalling it to mind; a revival in the mind or memory; recollection; as, a bitter remembrance of injuries.

Of joys departed,
Not to return, how painful the remembrance. Blair.

Remembrance is when the same idea recurs, without the operation of the like object on the external sensory. Locke.

2. Power or faculty of remembering; memory; limit of time over which the memory extends, as when we say an event took place before our remembrance, or since our remembrance.

Thou I have heard relating what was done
Ere my remembrance. Milton.

Remembrance wakes with all her busy train,
Swells at my breast, and turns the past to pain. Goldsmith.

3. The state of being remembered; the state of being held honourably in memory.

Grace and remembrance be unto you both. Shak.
The righteous shall be in everlasting remembrance. Ps. cxii. 6.

4. What is remembered; a recollection.

How sharp the point of this remembrance is! Shak.

5. That which serves to bring to or keep in mind; as, (a) an account preserved; a memorandum or note to preserve or assist the memory; a record.

Those proceedings and remembrances are in the Tower. Sir M. Hale.

Let the understanding reader take with him but three or four short remembrances—the memorandums I would commend to him are these. Chillingworth.

(b) A monument; a memorial. (c) A token by which one is kept in the memory; a keepsake.

Keep this remembrance for thy Julia's sake. Shak.
I am glad I have found this napkin:
This was her first remembrance from the Moor. Shak.

6. State of being mindful; thought; regard; consideration; notice of something absent.

We with wisest sorrow think on him,
Together with remembrance of ourselves. Shak.
Let your remembrance apply to Banquo. Shak.

7.† Admonition.

I do commit unto your hand
The unstained sword that you have used to bear;
With this remembrance—that you use the same
With the like bold, just, and impartial spirit,
As you have done 'gainst me. Shak.

—Memory, Recollection, Remembrance, Reminiscence. See under MEMORY.

Remembrancer (rēm'em'brans-ēr), n. 1. One who or that which reminds or revives the memory of anything.

God is present in the consciences of good and bad; he is there a remembrancer to call our actions to mind. Fer. Taylor.

Wonders—past the wit
Of any spirit to tell, but one of those
Who, when this planet's sphereing time doth close
Will be its high remembrancers. Keats.

2. An officer in the exchequer of England whose business is to record certain papers and proceedings, make out processes, &c.; a recorder. The officers bearing this name were formerly called clerks of the remembrance, and were three in number—the king's remembrancer, the lord treasurer's remembrancer, and the remembrancer of first-fruits; but the duties of the second of these offices were merged in the first by 3 and 4 Wm. IV. xcix. The name is also given to an officer of some corporations; as, the remembrancer of the city of London.

dis, salary, reward, in L.L. mercy, thanks.] To thank.

She him remierced as the patroness of her life.

Remerge (rê-mérj'), v.i. To merge again.

That each, who seems a separate whole,
Should move his rounds, and fusing all
The skirts of self again, should fall,
Remerging in the general soul,
Is faith as vague as all unweet.

Tennyson.

Remiform (rê-mi-form), a. [L. remus, an oar, and forma, shape.] Shaped like an oar.

Remiges (rê-mi-jéz), n.pl. [L. remex, remigis, a rower, from remus, an oar.] The quill feathers of the wings of a bird, which, like oars, propel it through the air.

Remote (rê-môt'), a. [L. remotus, from re-movere, to move—re, and moveo, motum, to move.] 1. Distant in place; not near; as, a remote country; a remote people. 'Some remote and desert place.' Shak.

Give me a life remote from guilty courts. Granville.

2. Distant or far away in various respects; as, (a) distant in time, past or future; as, remote antiquity.

It is not all remote and even apparent good that affects us. Locke.

(b) Not directly producing an effect; not proximate; as, the remote causes of a disease. 'From the effect to the remotest cause.' Granville. (c) Alien; foreign; not agreeing with; as, a proposition remote from reason. Locke. (d) Abstracted; separated.

Wherever the mind places itself by any thought, either amongst or remote from all bodies, it can, in this uniform idea of space, nowhere find any bounds. Locke.

(e) Distant in consanguinity or affinity; as, a remote kinsman. (f) Slight; incon siderable; as, a remote analogy between cases; a remote resemblance in form or colour.

Remotely (rê-môt'li), adv. In a remote manner; as, (a) at a distance in space or time; not nearly. (b) At a distance in consanguinity or affinity; as, remotely connected. (c) Slightly; in a small degree; as, to be remotely affected by an event.

Remoteness (rê-môt'nes), n. State of being remote or distant in space, time, consanguinity, operation, efficiency, &c.; distance; as, the remoteness of a kingdom or of a star; the remoteness of the deluge from our age; the remoteness of a future event; the remoteness of causes; remoteness of resemblance.

The most striking characteristic of the poetry of Milton is the extreme remoteness of the associations by means of which it acts on the reader. Its effect is produced, not so much by what it expresses, as by what it suggests; not so much by the ideas which it directly conveys, as by the other ideas which are connected with them. Macaulay.

Remoting (rê-môt'shon), n. 1.† The act of removing; removal.

That this remoting of the duke and her Is practice only. Shak.

Will take again your queen as yours at first. Shak.

5. In law, to carry from one court to another; as, to remove a cause or suit by appeal.

Remove (rê-môv'), v.i. To change place in any manner; to move from one place to another; to change the place of residence; as, to remove from Edinburgh to London.

Till Birnam wood remove to Dunsinane
I can not taint with fear. Shak.

The verb remove, in most of its applications, is synonymous with move, but not in all. Thus we do not apply remove to a mere change of posture, without a change of place or the seat of a thing. A man moves his head when he turns it, or his finger when he bends it, but he does not remove it. Remove usually or always denotes a change of place in a body, but we never apply it to a regular continued course or motion. We never say, the wind or water or a ship removes at a certain rate by the hour; but we say, a ship was removed from one place in a harbour to another. Move is a generic term, including the sense of remove, which is more generally applied to a change from one station or permanent position, stand, or seat to another station.

Remove (rê-môv'), n. 1. The act of removing, or state of being removed; a removal; change of place.

Our pleasure,
To such whose place is under us, requires
Our quick remove from hence. Shak.

What is early received in any considerable strength of impress grows into our tender nature, and is there of difficult remove. Glanville.

2. The distance or space through which anything is removed; interval; stage; step; especially, a step in any scale of gradation.

A freeholder is but one remove from a legislator. Addison.

They may pass into the hands of a posterity that lie many removes from us. Addison.

Hence—3. A class or division in a school or the like.

When a boy comes to Eton, he is 'placed' by the head-master in some class, division, or remove, and, of course, at the bottom. He advances in the school by going up two removes in a year. West. Rev.

4. A posting stage; the distance between two resting-places on a road. Shak.—5. The raising of a siege.

If they set down before 's, for the remove Bring up your army. Shak.

6. The act of changing a horse's shoe from one foot to another.

His horse wanted two removes, your horse wanted

7. A dish removed from table to make room for something else.

Removed (rê-môv'd), p. and a. 1. Changed in place; carried to a distance; displaced from office; placed far off.—2. Rempl (râh-plé), pp. [Fr., filled up.] In her. a term used when a chief is filled with any other metal or colour, leaving only a border of the first tincture round the chief.

Chief rempl.

Remuable, t. a. [From Fr. remuer, to move, to stir—l. re, and muto, to change.] Movable; inconstant. Chaucer.

Remue (rê-mû'), v.t. [Fr. remuer, to remove.] To remove.

But in that faith, wherewith he could remue
The steadfast hills, and seas dry up to nought,
He prayed the Lord. Faithful.

Remugient (rê-mû'ji-ent), a. [L. remugiens, remugientis, ppr. of remugio—re, again, and mugio, to bellow.] Rebellowing. 'Remugient echoes and ghastly murmurs.' Dr. H. More.

Remuner† (rê-mû'nér), v.t. To remunerate. Lord Rivers.

Remunerability (rê-mû'nér-a-bil'i-ti), n. The capacity of being remunerated or rewarded. Bp. Pearson.

Remunerable (rê-mû'nér-a-bl), a. Capable of being remunerated or rewarded; fit or proper to be recompensed.

Remunerate (rê-mû'nér-ât), v.t. pret. & pp. remunerated; ppr. remunerating. [L. remunero, remuneratum—re, back, and munus, muneris, a service, office, a present, gift.] To reward; to recompense; to requite, in a good sense; to pay an equivalent for any service, loss, expense, or other sacrifice; as, to remunerate troops for their services and sufferings; to remunerate men for labour.

The labour expended in producing the food and recompensed by it, needs not be remunerated over again from the produce of the subsequent labour which it has fed. J. S. Mill.

Remuneration (rê-mû'nér-â'shon), n. 1. The act of remunerating or paying for services, loss, or sacrifices.—2. What is given to remunerate; the equivalent given for services, loss, or sufferings.

Remuneration! O, that's the Latin word for three farthings. Shak.

SYN. Reward, recompense, compensation, repayment, satisfaction, requital.

Remunerative (rê-mû'nér-ât-iv), a. 1. Affording remuneration; yielding a sufficient return; as, his occupation was barely remunerative.—2. Exercised in rewarding; remuneratory. 'Punitive and remunerative justice.' Boyle.

Remunratory (rê-mû'nér-a-to-ri), a. Affording recompense; rewarding; requiting. Johnson.

Remurmur (rê-mêr'mêr), v.t. [L. remurmuro. See MURMUR.] To utter back in murmurs; to return in murmurs; to repeat in low hoarse sounds.

The trembling trees in every plain and wood,
Her fate remurmur to the silver flood. Pope.

Remurmur (rê-mêr'mêr), v.i. To murmur back; to return or echo in low rumbling sounds.

The realms of Mars remurmur'd all around. Dryden.

Renable, t. adv. [For reasonable, from O. Fr. reson, reason, also talk.] 1. Reasonable.—2. Loquacious. Piers Plowman.

Renaissance (rê-nâs'sâns), n. [Fr., regeneration or new birth—re, again, and naissance, birth. See RENASCENT.] The revival of anything which has long been in decay or extinct: a term generally applied to the transitional movement in Europe from the middle ages to the modern world; but specially applied to the time of the revival of letters and arts in the fifteenth century, and in a narrower sense to the style of building and decoration which succeeded the Gothic, and was to a large extent a revival of the forms and ornaments of Roman and Grecian art.—Renaissance architecture, a style which originated in Italy in the first half of the fifteenth century, and afterwards spread over Europe. Its main characteristic is a return to the classical forms which had been displaced by the Byzantine and the Gothic. The Florentine Brunelleschi (died 1446) may be said to have originated the style, having previously prepared himself by a careful study of the remains of the monuments of ancient Rome; and his buildings are distinguished by the use of the three classical orders, with much of the classical severity and grandeur, though in design they are made conformable to the wants of his own age. He sometimes retains, however, elements derived from the style which he superseded; as for instance in his masterpiece, the dome of Santa Maria del Fiore, where he makes a skilful use of the pointed Gothic vault. From Florence the style was introduced into Rome, where the noble and simple works of Bramante (died 1514) are among the finest examples of it, the chief of these being the palace of the Chancery, the foundations of St. Peter's, part of the Vatican, the small church of San Pietro in Montorio. It reached its highest pitch of grandeur in the dome of St. Peter's, the work of Michael Angelo, after whom it declined. Another Renaissance school arose in Venice, where the majority of the buildings of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries are distinguished by the prominence given to external decoration. From this school sprung Palladio (1518-1580), after whom the distinctive style of architecture which he followed received the name of Palladian. The Renaissance architecture was introduced into France by Lombardic and Florentine architects about the end of the sixteenth century, and flourished there during the greater part of the following century, but especially in the first half under Louis XII. and Francis I. The early French architects of this period, while adopting the ancient classical orders and other features of the new style, still retained many of the features of the architecture of the preceding ages; later on they followed classical types more closely. As applied to ecclesiastical edifices, the Renaissance style of architecture is charged in France as elsewhere with depriving them of all their religious character. Towards the end of the sixteenth century the Renaissance style degenerated in France as it had done in Italy, and in course of time gave rise to the insipid productions of the so-called Rococo style. Into England the Renaissance style was introduced at a later period than into France, and it is there represented by the works of Inigo Jones, Sir C. Wren, and their contemporaries, St. Paul's, London, being a grand example of the latter architect. A great many of the princely residences of Germany belong to the Renaissance style, but not to its best period.

Renaissant (rê-nâs'sant), a. Of or pertaining to the renaissance. See RENAISSANCE.

Renal (rên'al), a. [L. renalis, from ren, pl. renes, the kidneys.] Pertaining to the kidneys or reins; as, the renal arteries.—Renal glands, in anat. two flat triangular bodies, which cover the upper part of the kidneys. A hollow cavity in the interior contains a brown, reddish, or yellowish fluid. They are small in the adult, but in the fetus longer than the kidney. Also called the supra-renal glands or capsules. They have no excretory duct, and their use is unknown, but from the bronzing of the skin observed in 'Addison's disease' (connected with these bodies) it has been assumed that they have to do with the deposition of pigmentary matter in the skin.

Re-name (rê-nâm'), v.t. To give a new name to.

Renard (rên'ârd), n. [Fr., from O. G. Reinhard, Reginhart, strong in counsel, cunning—the name of a fox in a celebrated German epic poem.] A fox: a name used in fables, poetry, &c. It is also written Reynard.

Saint Renard through the hedge had made his way. Dryden.

Renascence (rê-nâs'sens), n. 1. The state of being renascent. Coleridge.—2. Same as Renaissance. [This form seems now to be getting pretty common.]

Unlike as the spirit of Calvinism seems to the spirit of the Renascence, both found a point of union in the exaltation of the individual man. J. R. Green.

Renascency (rê-nâs'sen-si), n. The state of springing or being produced again; renascence. Sir T. Browne.

Renascent (rê-nâs'sent), a. [L. renascens, renascens, ppr. of renascor—re, again, and nascor, natus, to be born.] Springing or rising into being again; reproduced; reappearing; rejuvenated.

It is not wonderful that old-fashioned believers in 'Protestantism' should shunt the subject of Papal Christianity into the Limbo of unknowable things, and treat its renascent vitality as a fact of curious historical reversion. Contemp. Rev.

Renascible (rê-nâs'si-bl), a. Capable of being reproduced; able to spring again into being.

Renat, Renate† (rên'at), n. The rennet apple. Drayton.

Renate† (rê-nât'), p. and a. [L. renatus, pp. of renascor, to be born again.] Born again; regenerate.

It is strange that those of your side should aver that the good works of those that renate should out of condignity merit heaven. Feltham.

Renavigate (rê-nâvi-gât), v.t. To navigate again; as, to renavigate the Pacific Ocean.

Renay† (rê-nâ'), v.t. [Fr. renier, from l. re, and nego, to deny.] To deny; to disown; to refuse.

They affirmed themselves rather to die than to renay their very God. Foyle.

Rencontre (rên-kôn'tér), n. French form of Rencontre.

Rencounter (ren-koun'tér), n. [Fr. rencontre = re-encounter.] 1. A meeting of two persons or bodies; a sudden coming in contact; collision.

Was it by mere chance that these blind parts of matter, floating in an immense space, did, after several joustings and rencounters, jumble themselves into this beautiful frame of things? Dr. F. Scott.

My boon is, that this gentleman may render
Of whom he had this ring. Shak.

2. Naut. (a) to yield or give way to the action of some mechanical power. (b) To pass freely through a block: said of a rope.

Render (ren'dér), n. 1. A return; a payment, especially a payment of rent.

In those early times the king's household was supported by specific renders of corn and other victuals from the tenants of the domains. Blackstone.

Each person of eighteen years old on a feud paid a certain head-money and certain renders in kind to the lord, as a personal payment. Brougham.

2.† A surrender; a giving up. Shak.—3.† An account given; a statement; a confession. 'May drive us to a render where we have lived.' Shak.

Renderable (ren'dér-a-bl), a. Capable of being rendered.

Renderer (ren'dér-ér), n. One who renders.
Rendering (ren'dér-ing), n. The act of one who renders, or that which is rendered; as, (a) a version; a translation; as, a particular rendering of a passage. (b) In the fine arts and drama, interpretation; delineation; reproduction; representation; exhibition.

When all is to be reduced to outline, the forms of flowers and lower animals are always more intelligible, and are felt to approach much more to a satisfactory rendering of the objects intended, than the outlines of the human body. Ruskin.

(c) The laying on of the first coat of plaster on brick or stone work. (d) The coat thus laid on.

Rendezvous (ren-de-vö or rân-dä-vö), n. [Fr. rendez-vous, rend yourself, repair to a place. 'I know not,' says Bishop Hurd, 'how rendezvous came to make its fortune in our language. It is of an awkward and ill construction, even in French.] 1. A place appointed for the assembling of troops, or the place where they assemble; the port or place where ships are ordered to join company.—2. A place of meeting; a place at which persons commonly meet. 'An inn, the free rendezvous of all travellers.' Sir W. Scott.—3. A meeting. [Rare.]

Their time is every Wednesday . . . in memory of the first occasions of their rendezvous. Bp. Sprat.

4.† A sign or occasion that draws men together.

The philosopher's stone and a holy war are but the rendezvous of cracked brains. Bacon.

5.† A refuge; an asylum; a retreat. 'A rendezvous, a home to fly unto.' Shak.

When I cannot live any longer, I will do as I may; that is my rest, that is the rendezvous of it. Shak.

Rendezvous (ren'de-vö or rân-dä-vö), v. i. pret. and pp. rendezvoused (ren'de-vöd); ppr. rendezvousing (ren'de-vö-ing). To assemble at a particular place, as troops.

Rent (rent), n. [Fr. rente; Pr. renta, renda; It. rendita, that which is rendered or given up. See RENDER.] 1.† Income; revenue. —2. A sum of money, or fixed amount of anything valuable, payable yearly for the use or occupation of lands or tenements; a compensation or return made to the owner by the user or occupier of any kind of property; as, the rent of a farm, of a deer-forest, of salmon-fishings: not necessarily, although by English usage generally, consisting in money. Rents, at common law, are of three kinds: rent-service, rent-charge, and rent-seck. Rent-service is when some corporal service is incident to it, as by fealty and a sum of money; rent-charge is when the owner of the rent has no future interest or reversion expectant in the land, but the rent is reserved in the deed by a clause of distress for rent in arrear; rent-seck, dry rent, is rent reserved by deed, but without any clause of distress. There are also rents of assize, certain established rents of freeholders and copyholders of manors, which cannot be varied; called also quit-rents. These, when payable in silver, are called white rents, in contradistinction to rents reserved in work or the baser metals, called black rents or black mail. A fee-farm rent is rent-charge issuing out of an estate in fee, of at least one-fourth of the value of the lands at the time of its reservation. The time of paying rents is either by the particular appointment of the parties in the deed, or by appointment of law, but the law does not control the express appointment of the parties, when such appointment will answer their intention. In England Michaelmas and Lady-day are the usual days appointed for payment of rents; and in Scotland Martinmas and Whitsunday. —3. In pol. econ. theoretically, that portion of the produce of land which remains after all expenses of cultivation and interest on capital are deducted, including remuneration of management.

to feel self-accusing pain or grief on account of; as, to repent rash words; to repent an injury done to a neighbour.

Thou like a contrite penitent, Charitably warned of thy sins, dost repent These vanities and giddiness.

Donne.

This verb was formerly often, and is still sometimes, used reflexively and impersonally.

No man repented him of his wickedness. Jer. viii. 6.

Lo! it repenteth me that man was made. Prior.

I repent me of all I did. Tennyson.

2. To be sorry for or on account of generally. 'Repented the evils she hatched were not effected.' Shak.

Repent† (rè-pent'), n. Repentance. Spenser.

Repentance (rè-pent'ans), n. [Fr. repentance. See above.] The act of repenting; the state of being penitent; sorrow for what one has done or left undone; especially, contrition for sin; such sorrow for past conduct as produces a new life.

Try what repentance can; what can it not?

Yet what can it when one can not repent? Shak.

What this repentance was which the new covenant required as one of the conditions to be performed by all those who should receive the benefits of that covenant, is plain in the Scripture, to be not only a sorrow for sins past, but (what is a natural consequence of such sorrow, if it be real) a turning from them into a new and contrary life.

Locke.

SYN. Penitence, contrition, contriteness, compunction.

Repentant (rè-pent'ant), a. [Fr. repentant.]

Repoussé (rĕ-pōs-sā), p. and a. [Fr., pp. of repousser — re, back, and *pu*sser, to push, to thrust. See PUSH.] A term applied to a style of ornamentation in metal, especially silver, resembling embossing. It is effected by repeated strokes of the hammer from behind until a rough image of the desired figure is produced, which is finished by chasing. The finest specimens of this style are those of Benvenuto Cellini of the sixteenth century. Much common work of this description, chiefly on tea and coffee pots, is executed at Birmingham in pewter and Britannia metal, and afterwards electroplated so as to hide the quality of the material.

Reprefe,† n. Reproof. Chaucer.

Reprehend (rep-rē-hend'), v. t. [L. reprehendo—re, back or again, and prehendo, to lay hold of—præ, before, and obs. hendo, seen also in comprehend, apprehend, &c.] 1. To charge with a fault; to chide sharply; to reprove; formerly sometimes followed by of. 'Aristippus being reprehended of luxury by one that was not rich.' Bacon.

Then pardon me for reprehending thee,
For thou hast done a charitable deed. Shak.

2. To take exception to; to speak of as a fault; to censure.

I nor advise nor reprehend the choice. J. Phillips.

3. † To detect of fallacy.

5. To supply the place or perform the duties or functions of; to speak and act with authority on behalf of; to be a substitute or agent for; as, the commercial traveller represents his employer; the member of parliament represents his constituents; parliament represents the nation; Lord Beaconsfield represented Britain at the Congress of Berlin.

6. To stand in the place of, in the right of inheritance.

All the branches inherit the same share that their root, whom they represent, would have done. Blackstone.

7. To serve as a sign or symbol of; as, mathematical symbols represent quantities or relations; words represent ideas or things.—8. To image or picture in sensation.

Among these, Fancy next
Her office holds; of all exterior things
Which the five watchful senses represent
She forms imaginations, airy shapes. Milton.

9. To present again; to bring again before the mind; to re-present. Sir W. Hamilton.

Re-present (ré-pré-zent'), v. t. [Prefix re, and present.] To present anew; to present to the mind after having been observed before.

Good reasoning is the ideal assemblage of facts, and their re-presentation to the mind in the order of their actual series. It is seeing with the mind's eye. Bad reasoning will always be found to depend on some of the objects not being mentally present; some links in the chain are dropped or overlooked; some objects instead of being re-presented are left absent, or are presented so imperfectly that the inferences from them are as croneous as the inferences from imperfect vision are erroneous. Bad reasoning is imperfect re-presentation. G. H. Lewes.

Representable (rep-rē-zent'a-bl), a. Capable of being represented. Coleridge.

The peripherally-initiated feelings of external origin are more representable than those of internal origin; and both of these can be represented with greater facility than the centrally-initiated feelings. H. Spencer.

Representant (rep-rē-zent'ant), a. Representing; having vicarious power.

Representant (rep-rē-zent'ant), n. A representative.

Representation (rep-rē-zen-tā'shon), n. 1. The act of representing, describing, exhibiting, portraying, &c.—2. That which represents; the means by which something is represented; more particularly, (a) an image or likeness; a picture or statue; as, representations of natural scenery. (b) Exhibition of a play on the stage, or of a character in a play; a dramatic performance. (c) Verbal description; statement of arguments or facts, &c.; as, the representation of an historian, of a witness, or an advocate. Hence sometimes, specifically, a written expostulation; a remonstrance.

He threatened 'to send his jack-boot to rule the country,' when the senate once ventured to make a representation against his ruinous policy. Brougham.

3. The part performed by a representative or deputy; especially, the function of the delegate of a constituency in a legislative assembly; the system according to which communities are represented in such assemblies; as, the representation of a county or borough in parliament.

The reform in representation he uniformly opposed. Burke.

4. A number of delegates or representatives collectively.—5. In law, (a) the standing in the place of another, as an heir, or in the right of taking by inheritance; the personating of another, as heirs, executors, administrators. In Scots law, the term is usually applied to the obligation incurred by an heir to pay the debts and perform the obligations incumbent upon his predecessor. (b) A collateral statement in insurance, either by parol or in writing, of such facts or circumstances relating to the proposed adventure, and not inserted in the policy, as are necessary for the information of the insurer, to enable him to form a just estimate of the risk. (c) In Scots law, the written pleading presented to a lord-ordinary of the Court of Session when his judgment was brought under review.—SYN. Description, show, delineation, portraiture, likeness, resemblance, exhibition, sight.

Re-presentation (ré-pré-zen-tā'shon), n. The act of presenting to the mind what was formerly present, but is now absent.

If all reasoning be the re-presentation of what is now absent but formerly was present, and can again be made present,—in other words, if the test of accurate reasoning is its reduction to fact,—then is it evident that Philosophy, dealing with transcendental objects which cannot be present, and employing a method which admits of no verification (or reduction to the test of fact), must be an impossible attempt. G. H. Lewes.

Representational (rep-rē-zen-tā'shon-al), a. Pertaining to, or containing representation.

Representational (rep-rē-zen-tā'shon-a-ri), a. Of or pertaining to representation; representative; as, a representational system of government. [Rare.]

Representative (rep-rē-zent'a-tiv), a. [Fr. représentatif. See REPRESENT.] 1. Fitted to represent, portray, or typify; exhibiting likeness or similitude.

They relieve themselves with this distinction, and yet own the legal sacrifices, though representative, to be proper and real. Atterbury.

2. Bearing the character or power of another; acting as a substitute for others; performing the functions of others; as, a representative body.

This council of four hundred was chosen, one hundred out of each tribe, and seems to have been a body representative of the people. Swift.

3. Conducted by the agency of delegates who are chosen by the people; as, a representative government.

He (Cromwell) gave the country a constitution far more perfect than any which had at that time been known in the world. He reformed the representative system in a manner which has extorted praise even from Lord Clarendon. Macaulay.

4. In nat. hist. presenting the full characteristics of the type of a group; as, a representative genus.—5. In metaph. (a) giving a transcript of what is directly presented to or known by the mind; as, the representative faculties. (b) Existing as a transcript of what was originally directly presented to or known by the mind; as, representative knowledge.

Representative (rep-rē-zent'a-tiv), n. 1. One who or that which represents or exhibits the likeness of another; that by which anything is represented or exhibited. 'A statue of Rumour, whispering an idiot in the ear, who was the representative of credulity.' Addison.

This doctrine supposes the perfections of God to be representatives to us of whatever we perceive in the creatures. Locke.

2. An agent, deputy, or substitute, who supplies the place of another or others, being invested with his or their authority; as, an attorney is the representative of his client or employer; a member of the House of Commons is the representative of his constituents and of the nation.—3. In law, one that stands in the place of another as heir, or in the right of succeeding to an estate of inheritance, or to a crown.—Real representative, an heir-at-law or devisee.—Personal representative, an executor or administrator.—House of Representatives, the lower or popular branch of the supreme legislative body in the United States; the lower house of the national congress. It consists of members chosen biennially by the people of the several states in numbers proportioned to their population. Each state appoints at least one representative.

Representativeness (rep-rē-zent'a-tiv-nes), n. The state or quality of being representative.

Repressibly (ré-pres'i-bli), adv. In a repressible manner.

Repression (ré-pres'shon), n. 1. The act of repressing, restraining, or subduing; as, the repression of tumults. 'What sublime repression of himself.' Tennyson.—2. That which represses; check; restraint.

Repressive (ré-pres'iv), a. Having power to repress or crush; tending to subdue or restrain.

It was now necessary to have recourse to repressive measures. Macaulay.

Repressively (rĕ-prĕs'iv-ly), adv. In a repressive manner; so as to repress.
Reprĕfĭcāt (rĕ-prĕf'), n. Reproof. Spenser.
Reprĕvĭal† (rĕ-prĕv'al), n. Respite; reprieve.

His (the sailor's) sleeps are but reprĕvĭals of his dangers.
Sir T. Overbury.

Reprĕve (rĕ-prĕv'), n. [O.E. repreve, repreve, reproof, censure; but in this case apparently = re-proof, a fresh proof or trial — re, again, and old preve, preef, a proof, test, trial; or, according to another view, from O. Fr. reprover, reprover, to blame, condemn; L. reprobare (re, and probo, to prove), to reject, condemn, meaning originally the rejection of a sentence already passed. Retrieve is a word that has undergone a similar change of form.] 1. The suspension of the execution of a criminal's sentence. It may take place (a) at the mere pleasure of the crown; (b) where the judge is not satisfied with the verdict, or the indictment is insufficient, or any favourable circumstances appear in the criminal's character, in order to give time to apply to the crown for either an absolute or conditional pardon; (c) where a woman is capitally convicted and pleads her pregnancy; (d) where the criminal becomes insane. The word is popularly but incorrectly used to signify a permanent remission, or commutation of a capital sentence.

The morning Sir John Hotham was to die, a reprĕve was sent to suspend the execution for three days.
Lord Clarendon.

2. Respite; interval of ease or relief.
All that I ask is but a short reprĕve
Till I forget to love, and learn to grieve. Denham.

Reprĕvie (rĕ-prĕv'), v.t. pret. & p.p. reprĕvied; ppr. reprĕvĭng. 1.† To reprove. Spenser. 2. To grant a respite to; to suspend or delay the execution of for a time; as, to reprĕvie a criminal for thirty days.

Having been condemned for his part in the late rebellion, his majesty had been pleased to reprĕvie him, with several of his friends, in order to give them their lives.
Addison.

3. To relieve for a time from any suffering.
Company, though it may reprĕvie a man from his melancholy, yet cannot secure a man from his conscience.
South.

Reprimand (rep-ri-mand'), n. [Fr. reprĕmande, from L. reprimĕnda, a thing to be checked or repressed, from reprimĕo, repressum, to repress. Reprimand would thus signify primarily a thing worthy of blame, then the act of blaming.] Severe reproof for a fault; reprehension, private or public; as, to give one a severe reprimand.

His letter is that of a superior, under the guise of the lowest humility, dictating what is irrefragably right; in its address it is the supplication of a sutor; in its substance, in its spirit, a lofty reprimand. Milman.

Reprimand (rep-ri-mand'), v.t. 1. To reprove severely; to reprehend; to chide for a fault.
Germanicus was severely reprimanded by Tiberius for travelling into Egypt without his permission.
Arbuthnot.

2. To reprove publicly and officially, in execution of a sentence; as, the court ordered the officer to be reprimanded.—Reprove, Rebuke, Reprimand, Censure, Remonstrate, Expostulate, Reproach. See under CENSURE.—SYN. To reprove, reprehend, chide, rebuke, censure, blame.

Reprint (rĕ-print'), v.t. 1. To print again; to print a second or any new edition of. Pope. 2. To renew the impression of.

South.

Reprint (rĕ-print'), n. A second or a new impression or edition of any printed work; reimpression.

Reprisal (rĕ-prĭ'zal), n. [Fr. reprĕsaille, from It. reprĕsaglia, from L.L. reprĕsallia, from L. reprehendo, to take again; comp. prize, a capture, reprise, a taking back, also from L. prehendo.] 1. The seizure or taking of anything from an enemy by way of retaliation or indemnification for something taken or detained by him; also, that which is so taken.

Reprisals are used between nation and nation in order to do themselves justice when they cannot otherwise obtain it. If a nation has taken possession of what belongs to another—if she refuses to pay a debt, to repair an injury, or to give adequate satisfaction for it, the latter seizes something belonging to the former, and applies it to her own advantage, unless she obtains payment of what is due to her, together with interest and damages, or may keep it as a pledge until she has received ample satisfaction. . . . Reprisals are either ordinary, as arresting and taking the goods of merchant-strangers within the realm, or extraordinary, as satisfaction out of the realm, and are under the great seal. Wharton.

2. The act of retorting on an enemy by inflicting suffering or death on a prisoner taken from him, in retaliation of an act of inhumanity.—3. Any taking by way of retaliation; an act of severity done in retaliation.

This gentleman, as it seems, being very desirous to make reprisals upon me, undertakes to furnish out a whole section of gross misrepresentations made by me in my quotations.
Waterland.

4. Same as Recapitulation.—Letters of marque and reprisal. See MARQUE.

Reprise (rĕ-prĭz'), n. [Fr. reprise, from reprĕndre, to take back; L. reprehendo. See REPRISAL.] 1.† A taking by way of retaliation.

If so, a just reprise would only be
Of what the land usur'd upon the sea. Dryden.

2. A term used by masons to denote the return of mouldings in an internal angle.—

3. In maritime law, a ship captured from an enemy or pirate. If recaptured within twenty-four hours of her capture, she must be restored to her owners in whole, if after that period she is the lawful prize of those who recaptured her.—4. pl. In law, yearly deductions, duties, or payments out of a manor and lands as rent-charge, rent-sock, annuities, and the like. Written also Reprises.

Reprise† (rĕ-prĭz'), v.t. 1. To take again; to retake. Spenser; Chapman.—2. To recompense; to pay.

Repristinate (rĕ-prĭs'tin-āt), v.t. To restore to pristine or first state or condition. [Rare.]

Repristination (rĕ-prĭs'tĭ-nā'shon), n. The act of restoring to original or first state or condition, or the state of being so restored; resuscitation. [Rare.]

Reprive† (rĕ-prĭv'), v.t. To reprieve; to rescue; to relieve from. Spenser.

Reprize (rĕ-prĭz'), v.t. To prize anew.

Reprize (rĕ-prĭz'), n. See REPRIZE, 4.

Reproach (rĕ-prōch'), v.t. [Fr. reprocher, O. Fr. reprochier, Pr. repropchar, to reproach, which Diez refers to a L.L. repropiare, from L. re, back, and prope, near. Reproach thus signifies primarily to bring near, to bring, as it were, under one's eyes. Compare sense of object (verb), which also primarily signifies to bring before the face. So also approach, from L. prope.] 1. To charge with a fault in severe language; to censure with severity, opprobrium, or contempt; to upbraid; now usually with a personal object. Mezentius . . . with his arduous war'm'd
His fainting friends, reproach'd their shameful flight.
Dryden.

That this new-comer Shame
There sit not, and reproach us as unclean.
Milton.

Am I the cause, I the poor cause that men
Reproach you, saying all your force is gone?
Tennyson.

2.† To disgrace. 'Else imputation . . . might reproach your life.' Shak.—Reprove, Rebuke, Reprimand, Censure, Remonstrate, Expostulate, Reproach. See under CENSURE. SYN. To upbraid, censure, blame, rebuke, condemn, revile, vilify.

Reproach (rĕ-prōch'), n. 1. The act of reproaching; a severe or cutting expression of censure or blame; censure mingled with contempt or opprobrium; contemptuous or opprobrious language towards any person; abusive reflections; as, to heap reproaches on a person. 'Foul-mouthed reproach.' Shak. 2. An occasion of blame or censure; shame; infamy; disgrace.

Give not thine heritage to reproach. Joel ii. 17.

3. Object of contempt, scorn, or derision.
Come, and let us build up the wall of Jerusalem, that we may be no more a reproach. Neh. ii. 17.

SYN. Disrepute, discredit, dishonour, scandal, opprobrium, invective, contumely, reviling, abuse, vilification, scurrility, insolence, insult, scorn, contempt, ignominy, shame, disgrace, infamy.

Reproachable (rĕ-prōch'a-bl), a. 1. Deserving reproach.—2.† Opprobrious; scurrilous; reproachful. 'Contumelious or reproachable verses.' Sir T. Elyot. [Rare.]

Reproacher (rĕ-prōch'ĕr), n. One who reproaches.

Reproachful (rĕ-prōch'ful), a. 1. Containing or expressing reproach or censure; upbraiding; scurrilous; opprobrious; as, reproachful words. 'Thrust these reproachful speeches down his throat.' Shak.—2. Worthy or deserving of reproach; shameful; bringing or casting reproach; infamous; base; vile; as, reproachful conduct. 'A reproachful life.' Milton.—SYN. Opprobrious, contemptuous, abusive, insulting, contemptuous, insolent, scurrilous, disreputable, discreditable, dishonourable, shameful, disgraceful, scandalous, base, vile, infamous.

Reproachfully (rĕ-prōch'ful-ly), adv. 1. In a reproachful manner: (a) in terms of reproach; opprobriously; scurrilously. 'Give none occasion to the adversary to speak reproachfully.' 1 Tim. v. 14. (b) Shamefully; disgracefully; contemptuously. 'Shall I then be used reproachfully?' Shak.

Reproachfulness (rĕ-prōch'ful-nes), n. Quality of being reproachful.

Reproachless (rĕ-prōch'les), a. Without reproach.

Reprobance† (rep'rō-bans), n. Reprobation.

Reprobate (rep'rō-bāt), a. [L. reprobatus, disapproved, pp. of reprobo—re, denoting the opposite of the action betokened by the simple verb, and probo, to approve. Comp. reprĕve and reprĕve.] 1.† Not enduring proof or trial; not of standard purity or fineness; disallowed; disapproved; rejected.

Reprobate silver shall men call them, because the Lord hath rejected them.
Jer. vi. 30.

2. Abandoned in sin; morally abandoned; depraved; profligate; lost to virtue or grace. 'By reprobate desire thus madly led.' Shak. 'Spirits reprobate.' Milton.

God forbid that every single commission of a sin . . . should so far deprave the soul, and bring it to such a reprobate condition, as to take pleasure in other men's sins.
South.

—Profligate, Reprobate, Abandoned. See under ABANDONED.—SYN. Abandoned, vitiated, depraved, corrupt, wicked, profligate, base, vile, castaway.

Reprobate (rep'rō-bāt), n. One who is very profligate or abandoned; a person abandoned to sin; one lost to virtue and religion; a wicked, depraved wretch; as, to shun the society of reprobates.

I acknowledge myself a reprobate, a villain, a traitor to the king, and the most unworthy man that ever lived.
Raleigh.

Reprobate (rep'rō-bāt), v.t. pret. & p.p. reprobated; ppr. reprobating. [L. reprobo, reprobatus. See the adjective.] 1. To disapprove with detestation or marks of extreme dislike; to condemn strongly; to condemn; to reject. It expresses more than disapprove. We disapprove of slight faults and improprieties; we reprobate what is mean or criminal.

And doth he reprobate, and will he damn
The use of his own bounty?
Couper.

2. In a milder sense, to disallow.
Such an answer as this, is reprobated and disallowed of in law.
Ayliffe.

3. To abandon to vice or punishment, or to hopeless ruin or destruction. 'A reprobated hardness of heart.' Sir R. L'Estrange.—Approbate and reprobate, in Scots law, to take advantage of one part of a deed and reject the rest. This is incompetent. A deed must be taken altogether or rejected altogether. See under APPROBATE.—SYN. To condemn, reprehend, censure, disown, abandon, reject.

Reprobateness (rep'rō-bāt-nes), n. The state of being reprobate.

Reprobater (rep'rō-bāt-ĕr), n. One who reprobates. 'John, Duke of Argyle, the patriotic reprobater of French modes.' Mark Noble.

Reprobation (rep'rō-bā'shon), n. [L. reprobatio, reprobationis. See REPROBATE.] 1. The act of reprobating, or of disapproving with marks of extreme dislike.

The profligate pretences . . . are mentioned with becoming reprobation.
Sc. Frey.

2. The state of being reprobated; condemnation; censure; rejection.

You are empowered to . . . put your stamp on all that ought to pass for current, and set a brand of reprobation on clipt poetry and false coin.
Dryden.

3. In theol. the act of consigning, or the state of being consigned to eternal punishment; or, that decree by which a certain number of the human race are supposed to have been set apart from eternity as reprobates: the opposite of election.—4. In eccles. law, the propounding of exceptions either to facts, persons, or things.

Reprobationer (rep'rō-bā'shon-ĕr), n. In theol. one who believes in the doctrine of the reprobation of the non-elect.

Let them take heed that they mistake not their own fierce temper for the mind of God. . . . But I never knew any of the Geneva or Scotch model, which sort of sanctified reprobationers we abound with, either use or like this way of preaching in my life; but generally whips and scorpions, wrath and vengeance, fire and brimstone, made both top and bottom, front and rear, first and last, of all their discourses. South.

Reprobative, Reprobatory (rē-prō-bāt-iv, rē-prō-bāt-o-ri), a. Of or pertaining to reprobation; condemning in strong terms; criminatory.

Reprobator (rē-prō-bāt-ōr), n. In Scots law, formerly an action instituted for the purpose of convicting a witness of perjury, or of proving that he was liable to the objections of capacity, enmity, partial counsel, or the like.

Reproduce (rē-prō-dūs'), v. t. pret. & pp. reproduced; ppr. reproducing. 1. To produce or yield again or anew; to renew the production of; to generate, as offspring; as, trees are reproduced by new shoots from the roots or stump; and certain animals, as the polyps, are reproduced by gemmation or budding.

If horse-dung reproduces oats it will not be easily determined where the power of generation ceaseth. Sir T. Browne.

2. To make a copy of; to portray; to represent; to bring to the memory or imagination; as, he reproduced the scene on canvas.

Reproducer (rē-prō-dūs-ēr), n. One who or that which reproduces. 'The reproducer of this fatal scheme.' Burke.

Reproduction (rē-prō-dūk'shon), n. 1. The act or process of reproducing, presenting, or yielding again.

The labourers and labouring cattle, therefore, employed in agriculture, not only occasion, like the workmen in manufactures, the reproduction of a value equal to their own consumption, or to the capital which employs them, together with its owners' profits, but of a much greater value. Adam Smith.

Specifically—2. The process whereby new individuals are generated and the perpetuation of the species insured; the process whereby new organisms are produced from those already existing; as, the reproduction of plants or animals.

Amid all the admirable contrivances of nature, for the reproduction of the species of all the myriads of organized nature, where shall we behold any for that of the same individual? Fellows.

3. That which is reproduced or revived; that which is presented anew; as, the play is not new, it is a reproduction.

Reproductive, Reproductory (rē-prō-dūktiv, rē-prō-dūk'tō-ri), a. Pertaining to or employed in reproduction; tending to reproduce; as, the reproductive organs of an animal.

Repromulgate (rē-prō-mul-gāt'), v. t. To promulgate again; to republish.

Repromulgation (rē-prō-mul-gā'shon), n. A second or repeated promulgation.

Reproof (rē-prōf'), n. [From reprove (which see).] 1. The expression of blame or censure addressed to a person; blame expressed to the face; censure for a fault; reprehension; rebuke; reprimand.

If you think well to carry this as you may, the doubtfulness of the benefit defends the deceit from reproof. Shak.

Those best can bear reproof, who merit praise. Pope.

2. Disproof; confutation; refutation.

The virtue of this jest will be the incomprehensible lies that this same fat rogue will tell us when we meet at supper . . . what wards, what blows, what extremities he endured; and in the reproof of this lies the jest. Shak.

—Admonition, Reprehension, Reproof. See under ADMONITION.—SYN. Reprehension, chiding, reprimand, rebuke, censure, blame.

Reprovable (rē-prōv'a-bl), a. Worthy of being reproofed; deserving reproof or censure; blamable. Jer. Taylor.—SYN. Blamable, censurable, reprehensible, culpable, rebukable.

Reprovableness (rē-prōv'a-bl-nes), n. State of being reprovable.

Reprovably (rē-prōv'a-bli), adv. In a reprovable manner.

Reproval (rē-prōv'al), n. Act of reproof; admonition; reproof.

Reprove (rē-prōv'), v. t. pret. & pp. reproved; ppr. reproving. [Fr. réprouver, to blame, to censure; O. Fr. reprover, from L. reprobo. See REPROBATE.] 1. To charge with a fault to the face; to chide; to reprehend. Luke iii. 19. Formerly sometimes with of; as, to reprove one of laziness. Carew.—2. To express disapproval of; as, to reprove sins; with a thing as object.—3. To have the effect of censuring; to serve to admonish.

The vicious cannot bear the presence of the good, whose very looks reprove them, and whose life is a severe, though silent admonition. Buckminster.

4. To convince, as of a fault; to make manifest.

When he is come he will reprove the world of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment. John xvi. 8.

5. To refute; to disprove.

My lords,
Reprove my allegation if you can,
Or else conclude my words effectual. Shak.

—Reprove, Rebuke, Reprimand, Censure, Remonstrate, Expostulate, Reproach. See under CENSURE.—SYN. To reprehend, chide, rebuke, scold, blame, censure.

Reprover (rē-prōv-ēr), n. One that reproves; one who or that which blames. 'The reprovers of vice.' Locke.

Reprovingly (rē-prōv-ing-li), adv. In a reproving manner.

Reprune (rē-prōn'), v. t. 1. To prune or trim again, as trees or shrubs. Evelyn.—2. To dress or trim again, as a bird its feathers. 'Yet soon reprunes her wing to soar anew.' Young.

Rep-silver (rep'sil-vēr), n. Money anciently paid by servile tenants to their lord, to be quit of the duty of reaping his corn.

Reptant (rep'tant), a. [See REPTATION.] In bot. and zool. creeping; crawling; reptatory.

Reptation (rep-tā'shon), n. [L. reptatio, reptationis, from repto, freq. of repo, to creep.] The act of creeping or crawling, as of the serpents and other members of the Reptilia.

Reptatory (rep'ta-to-ri), a. In zool. creeping; crawling; reptant; as, reptatory animals.

Reptile (rep'til), a. [Fr. reptile, from L. reptilis, creeping, from repo, reptum, to creep. Curius considers repo=repto, a metathesis of L. serpo, to creep (whence serpent). Cog. Gr. herpō, to creep, Skr. śrip, to go.] 1. Creeping; moving on the belly, or with small, short legs.—2. Grovelling; low; mean; vulgar; as, a reptile race or crew. 'A false, reptile prudence.' Burke.

Dislodge their reptile souls
From the bodies and forms of men. Cateridge.

Reptile (rep'til), n. 1. In a general sense, an animal that moves on its belly, or by means of small short legs, as snakes, lizards, caterpillars, &c.; a crawling creature; specifically, in zool. an animal belonging to the class Reptilia (which see).

An inadvertent step may crush the snail,
That crawls at evening in the public path;
But he that has humanity, forewarn'd
Will step aside and let the reptile live. Courper.

2. A grovelling, abject, or mean person: a term of contempt.

It would be the highest folly and arrogance in the reptile man to imagine that he, by any of his endeavors, could add to the glory of God. Warburton.

Reptilia (rep-til'i-a), n. pl. A class of vertebrate animals, constituting with the birds, to which they are most closely allied, Huxley's second division of vertebrates, Saurropsida. The reptiles lie between amphibia and birds, differing from the former chiefly in breathing by lungs during the whole period of their existence; and from birds in being cold-blooded, in the body being supplied with a mixture of venous and arterial blood, in being covered by plates or scales instead of feathers, and in the fore-legs never being constructed—in living reptiles at least—on the type of wings. The heart has only three cavities, viz. two separate auricles and a single ventricular cavity, usually divided into two by an incomplete partition. In the Crocodilia alone is the partition between the ventricles a perfect one; and even in these the heart consists functionally of no more than three chambers. The lungs are less cellular than in birds and mammals, and often attain a great size. Reptiles are oviparous, but in some cases, as in vipers and some lizards, the eggs are retained in the body till the young are ready to be excluded, when the animal is said to be ovo-viviparous. The lower jaw articulates with the skull by a quadrate bone, and, as this often projects backward, the opening of the mouth is very great and may even extend beyond the base of the skull. Except in the turtles and tortoises, teeth adapted rather for seizing and holding prey than for masticating it are present, but, save in the crocodiles, are not sunk in sockets. Ribs are always present. With the exception of the tortoises, reptiles are of an elongated form. In the serpents and some lizards no traces of limbs appear; in other lizards they are rudimentary, while in the remainder of the class they are fully developed, but not to the extent to which development takes place in birds and quadrupeds, these members seldom being of sufficient length to keep the belly from the ground. All reptiles have horny epidermic scales, and the class is divided into two sections—Squamata and Loricata, according as the exo-skeleton consists simply of these scales, or there are osseous plates developed in the derma as well. The class is divided into ten orders, of which the first four are represented by living forms; the remaining six are extinct. The living orders are the Chelonina (tortoises and turtles), Ophidia (serpents and snakes), Lacertilia (lizards), Crocodilia (crocodiles and alligators). The extinct orders are the Ichthyopterygia, Sauropterygia, Anomodontia, Pterosauria, Deinosaurs, and Theriodontia.

Reptilian (rep-til'i-an), a. Belonging to the Reptilia or reptiles.—Reptilian age, in geol. the era in which the class of reptiles attained its highest expansion, comprising the triassic, jurassic, and cretaceous periods.

Reptilian (rep-til'i-an), n. An animal of the class Reptilia; a reptile.

Republic (rē-pub'lik), n. [Fr. république, L. respublica—res, an affair, interest, and publica, fem. of publicus, public.] 1. A commonwealth; a political community in which the supreme power in the state is vested not in a hereditary ruler, but either in certain privileged members of the community or in the whole community. According to the constitution of the governing body a republic may therefore vary from the most exclusive oligarchy to a pure democracy, the supreme power in the former being consigned to the nobles or a few privileged individuals, as was formerly the case in Venice and Genoa; while in the latter the supreme power is placed in the hands of rulers chosen periodically by and from the whole body of the people, or by their representatives assembled in a congress or national assembly. The purest and most ancient form of a republic was that in which all the citizens met in common assembly to enact their laws, a system practicable only in very small states, and which accordingly has been superseded in all modern republics of the world by the representative system. The United States of America and Switzerland are federal republics, consisting of a number of separate states bound together by treaty, so as to present to the external world the aspect of a single state with a central government, without wholly renouncing their individual powers of internal self-government.—2. A country at large; the state; the public.

Those that by their deeds will make it known,
Whose dignity they do sustain;
And life, state, glory, all they gain,
Count the republic, not their own. B. Jonson.

—Republic of letters, the collective body of literary and learned men.

Republican (rē-pub'li-kan), a. 1. Pertaining to a republic; consisting of a commonwealth; as, a republican constitution or government.—2. Consonant to the principles of a republic; as, republican sentiments or opinions; republican manners.—Republican party, in United States politics, a name first applied to the party which favoured a strong central government, not acting through the states, but directly upon the people: opposed to the Democratic party, which maintained the rights of individual states. The party was latterly identified with the anti-slavery movement, and may be, in a general way, described as analogous to the British Liberal party.

Republican (rē-pub'li-kan), n. 1. One who favours or prefers a republican form of government.

There is a want of polish in the subjects of free states which has made the roughness of a republican almost proverbial. Brougham.

2. In United States politics, one of the Republican party. See under the adjective.—Black Republicans, a name applied by their opponents to the Republican party in the United States, from their anti-slavery tendencies.—Red Republican. See under RED.

Republicanism (rē-pub'li-kan-izm), n. 1. A republican form or system of government.—2. Attachment to a republican form of government; republican principles; as, his republicanism was of the most advanced type.

Republicize (rē-pub'li-kan-iz'), v. t. To convert to republican principles; as, to republicize the rising generation.

Republication (rē-pub'li-kā'shon), n. 1. The act of republishing; a new publication of something before published; as, the republication of a book or pamphlet. —2. The reprint in one country of a work published in another. —3. In law, a second publication of a former will after cancelling or revoking.

If there be many testaments, the last overthrows all the former; but the republication of a former will revokes one of a later date, and establishes the first.

Blackstone.

Republish (rê-pub'lish), v.t. To publish anew: (a) to publish again, as a new edition of a book. (b) To print or publish again, as a foreign reprint. (c) In law, to revive, as a will revoked, either by re-execution or by a codicil. Blackstone.

Republisher (rê-pub'lish-ér), n. One who republishes.

Repudiable (rê-pu'di-a-bl), a. Capable of being repudiated or rejected; fit or proper to be put away.

Repudiate (rê-pu'di-ât), v.t. pret. & pp. repudiated; ppr. repudiating. [L. repudiô, repudiâtum, to divorce, to cast off or reject, from repudium, a casting off, a divorce.] 1. To cast away; to reject; to discard; to renounce; to disavow.

Atheists . . . repudiate all title to the kingdom of heaven. Bentley.

2. To put away; to divorce.

His separation from Terentia, whom he repudiated not long afterward, was perhaps an affliction to him at this time. Bolingbroke.

3. To refuse to acknowledge or to pay, as debt; to disclaim; specifically, to disown, as debts contracted by a former government for the convenience or to meet the necessities of the state.

Repudiation (rê-pu'di-â'shon), n. [L. repudiatio, repudiatio, from repudiô. See REPUDIATE.] The act of repudiating or the state of being repudiated: (a) rejection; disavowal or renunciation of a right or obligation. (b) The putting away of a wife or a woman betrothed; divorce. (c) Refusal on the part of a government to pay debts contracted by a former government. (d) Eccles. the refusal to accept a benefice.

Repudiationist (rê-pu'di-â'shon-ist), n. One who advocates repudiation; one who disclaims liability for debt contracted by a predecessor in office, &c.

Repudiator (rê-pu'di-ât-ér), n. One who repudiates.

Repugn (rê-pûn'), v.t. [L. repugno, to fight against — re, against, and pugno, to fight.] To oppose; to resist; to fight against. 'When stubbornly he did repugn the truth.' Shak.

Repugn (rê-pûn'), v.i. To oppose; to make resistance. Spenser.

Nature repugning, they scarce taste anything that may be profitable. Sir T. Elyot.

Repugnableness (rê-pûn'a-bl), a. Capable of being resisted.

Repugnance (rê-pug'nans), n. [Fr. repugnance; L. repugnantis, from repugno, to resist — re, against, and pugno, to fight (whence pugnacious, impugno, &c.).] 1. The state of being opposed in mind; opposition of mind; reluctance; unwillingness. 'The repugnance which we naturally have to labour.' Dryden.

It was the part of a prudent successor to preserve an undeviating economy, to remove without repugnance or delay the irritations of monopolies and purveyance, and to remedy those alleged abuses in the church. Hallam.

2. Opposition of principles or qualities; inconsistency; contrariety; as, the repugnance of a thing to reason. 'Repugnances of works and words.' Prynne. — Antipathy, Hatred, Aversion, Repugnance. See under ANTIPATHY. — SYN. Reluctance, unwillingness, aversion, dislike, antipathy, hatred, hostility, irreconcilableness, contrariety, inconsistency.

Repugnancy (rê-pug'nân-si), n. 1. Repugnance; contrariety; inconsistency.

But where difference is without repugnancy, that which hath been does no prejudice to that which is. Hooker.

2. Act of resisting; resistance.

And let the foes quietly cut their throats, Without repugnancy. Shak.

Repugnant (rê-pug'nant), a. [L. repugnans, repugnantis, ppr. of repugno. See REPUGNANCE.] 1. Standing or being in opposition; opposite; contrary; at variance; inconsistent; usually followed by to, but sometimes by with; as, a supposition repugnant to common sense; every sin is repugnant to the will of God. 'So repugnant and contrarie are the physicians one to another.' Holland. 'A sense repugnant with their other known doctrines.' Waterland. 'Maxims repugnant to justice.' Principal Robertson.

There is no breach of a divine law, but is more or less repugnant unto the will of the lawgiver, God himself. Perkins.

Repulse (rê-puls'), n. [L. repulsâ, from repello, repulsus — re, back, and pello, to drive.]

1. The condition of being repelled; the condition of being checked in advancing, or driven back by force. 'By fate repelled, and with repulses tired.' Sir J. Denham. — 2. The act of repelling or driving back.

He received in the repulse of Tarquin, seven hurts to the body. Shak.

3. Refusal; denial.

Take no repulse, whatever she doth say. Shak.

4. Failure; disappointment.

Do not, for one repulse, forego the purpose That you resolved to effect. Shak.

Repulse (rê-puls'), v.t. pret. & pp. repulsed; ppr. repulsing. [See the noun.] 1. To repel; to beat or drive back; as, to repulse an assailant or advancing enemy.

Complete to have discovered and repulsed Whatever wiles of foe or seeming friend. Milton.

2. To refuse; to reject.

She took the fruits of my advice;
And he, repulsed — a short tale to make —
Fell into a sadness. Shak.

Repulseless (rê-puls'les), a. Incapable of being repelled. [Rare.]

Repulsor (rê-puls'ér), n. One who or that which repulses or drives back.

Repulsion (rê-pul'shon), n. [L. repulsio, repulsio, from repello, repulsus. See REPULS.] The act of repelling or driving back, or the state of being repelled; specifically, in physics, a term often applied to the action which two bodies exert upon one another when they tend to increase their mutual distance. It was formerly thought that there were two forces, attraction and repulsion, which balanced and counteracted each other; but it is now known that all apparent repulsion is merely a difference of attractions. All repulsion can be referred to attraction, and attraction to displacements in and through material media.

Repulsive (rê-pul'siv), a. 1. Acting so as to repel or drive away; exercising repulsion; repelling. 'A repulsive force by which they fly from one another.' Newton. 'The repulsive hand of Diomed.' Chapman. — 2. † Resisting; withstanding.

The foe thrice tugged, and shook the rooted wood;
Repulsive of his might the weapon stood. Pope.

Monarch in heaven, till then as one secure,
Sat on his throne upheld by old repute. Milton.

— Habit and repute, in Scots law, an expression applied to whatever is held and reputed or generally received as matter of fact; as, a habit and repute thief; a habit and repute marriage.

Reputed (rê-püt-ti), p. and a. Generally considered or esteemed; generally believed, regarded, or accounted. 'The reputed son of Cordellion.' Shak. — Reputed owner, in law, one who has to all appearances the right and actual possession of property. When a reputed owner becomes bankrupt, all goods and chattels in his possession, with the consent of the true owner, may in general be claimed by the trustee for the benefit of the creditors.

Reputedly (rê-püt-ti-li), adv. In common opinion or estimation; by repute.

Reputeless (rê-püt'les), a. Not having good repute; obscure; inglorious; disreputable; disgraceful. 'Reputeless banishment.' Shak.

Requa-battery (rê'kwa-bat'ê-ri), n. A kind of mitrailleuse, consisting of a number of rifle breech-loading barrels arranged upon a horizontal plane on a light field carriage, used in the American civil war.

Require, v.t. To require. Chaucer.

Request (rê-kwest'), n. [O. Fr. requeste; Mod. Fr. requête, from L. requisita, a thing required, a want, a need, from requiro, requisitum — re, again, and quero, questum, to seek, to look or search for. Require, quest, inquisition, &c., all have the same origin.] 1. The expression of desire to some person for something to be granted or done; an asking; a petition; a prayer; an entreaty.

Haman stood up to make request for his life to Esther the queen. Est. vii. 7.

'To what request for what strange boon,' he said,
'Are these your pretty tricks and fooleries,
O Vivien, the preamble?' Tennyson.

2. The thing asked for or requested.

I will both hear and grant you your requests. Shak.
He gave them their request; but sent leanness into their soul. Ps. cvi. 15.

3. † A question.

My prime request,
Which I do last pronounce, is, O you wonder!
If you be maid or no. Shak.

4. A state of being desired or held in such estimation as to be sought after, pursued, or asked for. 'Coriolanus being now in no request.' Shak.

Knowledge and fame were in as great request as wealth among us now. Sir W. Temple.

Request expresses less earnestness than entreaty and supplication, and supposes a right in the person requested to deny or refuse to grant. In this it differs from demand.—Court of requests, in England, a court of equity for the relief of such persons as addressed his majesty by supplication, abolished by stat. 16 and 17 Car. I. The name was also given to tribunals of a special jurisdiction for the recovery of small debts, which were for the most part abolished by the County Court Act of 1846.—Letters of requests: (a) in eccles. law, an instrument by which the regular judge of a cause waives or remits his own jurisdiction, in which event the cause comes under the jurisdiction of the Court of Arches. (b) Letters formerly granted by the lord privy-seal preparatory to granting letters of marque.—SYN. Asking, solicitation, petition, prayer, supplication, entreaty, suit.

Request (rê-kwest'), v. t. [See the noun.] 1. To make a request for; to ask; to solicit; to express desire for.

The weight of the golden ear-rings which he requested was a thousand and seven hundred shekels of gold. Judg. viii. 26.

Resign (ré-sin'), v.t. To sign again.

Resign† (ré-zin'), n. Resignation. Beau. & Fl.

Resignant (rez'ig-nant), a. In her. concealed; applied to a lion's tail.

Resignation (rez-ig-nā'shon), n. 1. The act of resigning or giving up, as a claim, office, place, or possession; as, the resignation of a crown or commission. 'The resignation of thy state and crown.' Shak.—2. The state of being resigned or submissive; unresisting acquiescence; patience; endurance; particularly, quiet submission to the will of Providence; submission without discontent, and with entire acquiescence in the divine dispensations.

Resignation superadds to patience a submissive disposition respecting the intelligent cause of our uneasiness. It acknowledges both the power and the right of a superior to inflict. Cogan.

3. In Scots law, the form by which a vassal returns the feu into the hands of a superior. SYN. Surrender, relinquishment, abandonment, abdication, renunciation; submission, acquiescence, patience, endurance.

Resigned (ré-zind'), p. and a. 1. Surrendered; given up.—2. Feeling resignation; submissive; patient.

A firm, yet cautious mind; Sincere, though prudent; constant, yet resign'd. Pope.

With all my strength I pray'd for both, and so I felt resign'd. Tennyson.

Resignedly (ré-zin'ed-li), adv. With resignation; submissively.

Resignee (ré-zin'è), n. In law, the party to whom a thing is resigned.

Resigner (ré-zin'ér), n. One who resigns.

Resignment (ré-zin'ment), n. The act of resigning. 'His full resignation.' Beau. & Fl.

Resile (ré-zil'), v.i. pret. & pp. resiled; ppr. resiling. [L. resilio, to leap or spring back—re, back, and salio, to leap.] To start back; to recede from a purpose; to recoil. 'The small majority . . . resiling from their own previously professed intention.' Sir W. Hamilton.

The more I resiled from their excessive civilities, the more I was loaded with them. Hume.

Resilience, Resiliency (ré-sil'i-ens, ré-sil'i-l-en-si), n. The act of resiling, leaping, or springing back; the act of rebounding; as, the resilience of a ball or of sound. 'Whether there be any such resilience in echoes.' Bacon. 'The common resiliency of the mind from one extreme to the other.' Johnson.

Resilient (ré-sil'i-ent), a. [L. resiliens, resiliens, ppr. of resilio. See RESILE.] Inclined to resile; leaping or starting back; rebounding.

Resilition (ré-sil'i-shon), n. The act of resiling or springing back; resilience. [Rare.]

Resin (rez'in), [Fr. résine, L. resina.] An inflammable substance found in most vegetables, and in almost every part of them. Resins are obtained chiefly in two ways, either by spontaneous exudation from the plants, or by extraction by heat and alcohol. They are entirely insoluble in water, but soluble in ether and the volatile oils, partially soluble in alcohol and the fixed oils, and dissolvable under heat. They are divisible into hard resins and soft resins, the former being solid and brittle at ordinary temperatures, easily pulverized, and containing little or no essential oil; the latter being mouldable by the hand, while some of them are viscous and semi-fluid, in which case they are called balsams. When pure, resins are nearly insipid and inodorous. They are non-conductors of electricity, and when excited by friction with a woollen cloth their electricity is negative. They combine with the alkalis of the metals, performing the function of weak acids, and forming soaps. They are soluble in many of the acids, and convertible by some into other peculiar acids. They are composed of carbon, hydrogen, and oxygen, and are supposed to be formed by the oxygenation of the essential oils. There is a great number and variety of the resins. They are valuable as ingredients in varnishes, and several of them are used in medicine. The common resin of commerce exudes in a semi-fluid state from several species of pine. Resins are often naturally blended with gum, in which they constitute the series of gum-resins. See GUM.—Kauri, couree, or coudee resin, a gum or resin imported from New Zealand, and obtained from the Dammara australis, or kauri-pine. See DAMMAR-RESIN.—Resin of aldehyde, a product of the decomposition of the aqueous solution of aldehyde by caustic potash.—Resin of copper, a name given to the protochloride of copper from its resemblance to common resin.—Fossil or mineral resins, a term applied to amber, petroleum, asphalt, bitumen, and other mineral hydrocarbons. See COLOPHONY, ROSIN.

Resinaceous (rez-in-ă-shus), a. Resinous; having the quality of resin.

Resinate (rez-in-ăt), n. A general name for a salt of the acids obtained from turpentine, viz. sylvic, pinic, and pimic acid. The general formula of these salts are $C_{10}H_{15}MO_2$ and $C_{10}H_{13}M_2O_4$.

Resin-bush (rez-in-bijsh), n. A colonial South African name for Euryops speciosissimus, so called because of a gummy exudation often seen on the stem and leaves.

Resiniferous (rez-in-if-er-us), a. [L. resina, and fero, to produce.] Yielding resin; as, a resiniferous tree or vessel.

Resinification (rez-in'i-fi-kă'shon), n. The act or process of treating with resin.

The resinification of the drying oils may be effected by the smallest quantities of certain substances. Ure.

Resiniform (rez'in-i-form), a. Having the form of resin.

Resino-electric (rez'in-ô-lek'trik), a. Containing or exhibiting negative electricity; applied to certain substances, as amber, sealing-wax, &c., which become resinously or negatively electric under friction.

Resinoid (rez'in-oid), a. Resembling resin.

Resinous (rez'in-us), a. Pertaining to or obtained from resin; partaking of the qualities of resin; like resin; as, resinous substances.—Resinous electricity, negative electricity, that kind of electricity which is excited by rubbing bodies of the resinous kind with a woollen cloth; in distinction from that excited by rubbing glass, &c., which is termed vitreous or positive electricity.

Resinously (rez'in-us-li), adv. In the manner of a resinous body; by means of resin; as, resinously electrified.

Resinousness (rez'in-us-nes), n. The quality of being resinous.

Resiny (rez'in-i), a. Like resin, or partaking of its qualities.

Resipiscence (res-i-pis-sens), n. [Fr. resipiscence, from L. resipiscētia, from resipisco, to recover one's senses, inceptive of resipio—re, again, and sapio, to taste.] Wisdom after the fact; change to a better frame of mind; repentance. [Rare.]

Resist (rê-zist'), v.t. [Fr. résister, from L. resisto, to withstand—re, and sisto, to cause to stand, to set or place, to stand, from sto, to stand, the root being that of E. stand.]

1. Lit. to stand against; to withstand, so as not to be impressed by; hence, to counteract, as a force by inertia or reaction; to oppose; as, a dam or mound resists a current of water (passively), by standing unmoved and interrupting its progress.

The sword
Of Michael from the armoury of God
Was given him temper'd so, that neither keen
Nor solid might resist that edge. Milton.

2. To act in opposition to; to strive against; to endeavour to counteract, defeat, or frustrate; as, an army resists the progress of an enemy (actively), by encountering and defeating it.

Ye do always resist the Holy Ghost. Ac. vii. 51.
Resist the devil, and he will flee from you. Jam. iv. 7.

3. To baffle; to disappoint.
God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace to the humble. Jam. iv. 6.

4. † To be disagreeable or distasteful to; to offend.

These cakes resist me, she but thought upon. Shak.

SYN. To withstand, oppose, hinder, check, thwart, baffle, disappoint.

Resist (rê-zist'), v.t. To make opposition.
He now obeys, and now no more resisteth,
While she takes all she can, not all she listeth. Shak.

Resist (rê-zist'), n. In calico-printing, a sort of paste applied to calico goods to prevent colour or mordant from fixing on those parts not intended to be coloured, either by acting mechanically in preventing the colour, &c., from reaching the cloth, or chemically in changing the colour so as to render it incapable of fixing itself in the fibres. Called also Resist-paste and Reserve.—Resist-work, calico with a blue ground and white patches or spots.

Sir Robert Peel was quick to appreciate the value of all new processes and inventions, in illustration of which we may allude to his adoption of the process for producing what is called resist-work in calico-printing. This is accomplished by the use of a paste, or resist, on such parts of the cloth as are to remain white. Smiles.

Resistance (rê-zist'ans), n. 1. The act of resisting; opposition. Resistance is passive, as that of a fixed body which interrupts the passage of a moving body; or active, as in the exertion of force to stop, repel, or defeat, progress or designs.

Nevertheless there is none so perfect in this life that findeth not let and resistance by the reason of original sinne. Tyndale.

In the middle ages resistance was an ordinary remedy for political distempers, a remedy which was always at hand, and though doubtless sharp at the moment produced no deep or lasting ill effects.

Macaulay.
2. In physics, the quality or property in matter of not yielding to force or external impression; that power of a body which acts in opposition to the impulse or pressure of another, or which prevents the effect of another power; as, the resistance of air to the motion of a cannon-ball, or of water to the motion of a ship. The resistance produced by the rubbing of the surfaces of two bodies against each other, caused by the asperities or inequalities of the rubbing surfaces, is called friction (which see).—Resistance or resisting force, in physics, denotes, generally, a force acting in opposition to another force so as to destroy it, or diminish its effect. It is a power by which motion, or a tendency to motion in any body, is retarded or prevented. Resistance is sometimes considered as of two kinds, active and passive, the first being that which corresponds to the useful effect produced by a machine, and the second that which arises from the inertia of the machine.—Resistance coil, in teleg. a coil usually of a material of a less conducting power than the main circuit, introduced into a circuit to increase the resistance.

Electric resistance, the force required to electrify a given body, and therefore the opposition to the passage of a current.—Solid of least resistance, in mech. the solid whose figure is such that in its motion through a fluid it sustains the least resistance of all others having the same length and base; or, on the other hand, being stationary in a current of fluid, offers the least interruption to the progress of that fluid. In the former case it has been considered the best form for the stem of a ship; in the latter the proper form for the pier of a bridge. The problem of finding the solid of least resistance was first proposed and solved by Newton.—Unit of resistance, in elect. the standard of measurement of electric resistance. The unit adopted by the British Association is called an ohm (which see); it is about equal to the resistance of a round copper wire 485 metres long and 1 millimetre in diameter. The French unit of resistance equals nearly 9 ohms.—SYN. Opposition, antagonism, hinderance, check.

Resistant (rê-zist'ant), n. One who or that which resists.

According to the decrees of power in the agent and resistant is an action performed or hindered. Bp. Pearson.

Resistant, Resistent (rê-zist'ant, rê-zist'ant), a. Making resistance; resisting.

Resister (rê-zist'er), n. One who resists; one who opposes or withstands. 'Resisters of God's spirit.' South.

Resistful (rê-zist'ful), a. Resisting.

Resistibility (rê-zist'i-bil'i-ti), n. 1. Quality of being resistible; as, the resistibility of grace.—2. † The quality of resisting.

The name body, being the complex idea of extension and resistibility together in the same subject, these two ideas are not exactly one and the same. Locke.

Resistible (rê-zist'i-bl), a. Capable of being resisted; as, a resistible force; resistible grace.

Resistibleness (rê-zist'i-bl-nes), n. The quality of being resistible; resistibility.

Resistibly (rê-zist'i-bli), adv. In a resistible manner.

Resisting (rê-zist'ing), p. and a. Withstanding; opposing.—Resisting force. See under RESISTANCE.—Resisting medium, a substance which opposes the passage of a body through it. Specifically, in astron. an exceedingly rare medium supposed to be diffused through space; ether (which see).

Resistingly (rê-zist'ing-li), adv. With resistance or opposition; so as to resist.

Resistive (rê-zist'iv), a. Having the power to resist. B. Jonson.

Resistless (rê-zist'les), a. 1. Incapable of being resisted, opposed, or withstood; irresistible. 'A power resistless.' Milton. 'Resistless in her love as in her hate.' Dryden.

2. Powerless to resist; helpless.
Resistless, tame,
Am I to be burned up? No I will shout
Until the gods through heaven's blue look out. Keats.

Resistlessly (rê-zist'les-li), adv. In a resistless manner; so as not to be opposed or denied.

Resistlessness (rê-zist'les-nes), n. State of being resistless or irresistible.

Resist-paste (rê-zist'păst), n. See RESIST, n.

Resmooth (rê-smôth'), v.t. To make smooth again; to smooth out.

And thus your pains
May only make that foot-print upon sand
Which old-recurring waves of prejudice
Resmooth to nothing. Tennyson.

Resold (rê-sôld'), pp. of resell. Sold a second time, or sold after being bought.

Resolder (rê-sôl'dér), v.t. To solder or mend again; to rejoin; to make whole again. 'Resolder'd peace.' Tennyson.

Resoluble (rez-o-lü-bl), a. [Fr. résoluble.] Capable of being resolved, melted, or dissolved; as, bodies resoluble by fire.

Resolubleness (rez-o-lü-bl-nes), n. Quality of being resolvable.

Resolute (rez'o-lüt), a. [Fr. résolu, pp. of résoudre, to resolve. See RESOLVE.] 1. Having a fixed purpose; determined; hence, bold; firm; steady; constant in pursuing a purpose.
Edward is at hand,
Ready to fight; therefore be resolute. Shak.

2. † Convinced; satisfied; certain.—3. † Resolving; convincing; satisfying. 'I have given resolute answer.' Foxe.—SYN. Determined, decided, fixed, steadfast, firm, steady, constant, persevering, bold, unshaken.

Resolute (rez'o-lüt), n. 1. A resolute or determined person.

Young Fortinbras
Hath, in the skirts of Norway, here and there, Sharped up a list of landless resolutes. Shak.

2. Repayment; redelivery. 'Yearly resolutes.' Burnet.

Resolutely (rez'o-lüt-li), adv. In a resolute manner; with fixed purpose; firmly; steadily; with steady perseverance; boldly; as, persist resolutely in a course of virtue.

Some of these facts he examines, some he resolutely denies. Swift.

Resoluteness (rez'o-lüt-nes), n. The quality of being resolute; fixed purpose; firm determination; unshaken firmness.

Resolution (rez-o-lü'shon), n. [Fr. résolution, from L. resolutio. See RESOLVE.] 1. The act, operation, or process of resolving; as, (a) the act of separating the component parts of a body, as by chemical means. (b) The act of separating the parts which compose a complex idea. (c) The act of unravelling a perplexing question, a difficult problem, or the like; explication.

The unravelling and resolution of the difficulties that are met with in the execution of the design, are the end of an action. Dryden.

2. The state or process of dissolving; dissolution; solution. Sir K. Digby.—3. The state of being resolved or determined; a fixed purpose or determination of mind; a settled purpose; as, a resolution to reform our lives; a resolution to undertake an expedition.

Your resolution cannot hold, when 'tis Opposed, as it must be, by the power of the king. Shak.

4. The quality or character of acting with fixed purpose; resoluteness; firmness, steadiness, or constancy in execution; determination; as, a man of great resolution.

They who governed the parliament, had the resolution to act those monstrous things. Clarendon.

5. A formal determination or decision of a legislative or corporate body, or of any association of individuals; a formal proposition brought before a public body for discussion and adoption; as, the resolutions of a public meeting.

Every question, when agreed to, assumes the form either of an order or a resolution of the house (Parliament). By its orders the house directs its committees, its members, its officers, the order of its own proceedings, and the acts of all persons whom they may concern; by its resolutions, the house declares its own opinions and purposes. Sir E. May.

6. Determination of a cause in a court of justice; as, a judicial resolution. Sir M. Hale. [This word is now seldom used to express the decision of a judicial tribunal; we use judgment, decision, or decree.]

7. † The state of being settled in opinion; freedom from doubt; conviction; certainty.

8. † The state of being relaxed; relaxation; a weakening. 'The resolution and languor ensuing.' Sir T. Browne.—9. In music, the succession of a concord immediately after a discord, by raising or depressing a note a tone or a semitone, according to the rules of harmonical progression.—10. In med. a removal or disappearance, as the disappearing of a tumour without coming to suppuration, the dispersing of inflammation, the breaking up and disappearance of fever.—11. In math. the orderly enumeration of the things to be done to obtain what is required in a problem. A problem may be divided into three parts—the proposition, the resolution or solution, and the demonstration.—Resolution of an equation, in alg. the bringing of the unknown quantity by itself on one side, and all the known quantities on the other, without destroying the equation, by which is found the value of the unknown quantity; the reduction of an equation.—Resolution of forces or of motion, in dyn. the dividing of any single force or motion into two or more others, which, acting in different directions, shall produce the same effect as the given motion or force. This is the reverse of composition of forces or of motion. Thus, let A B represent the quantity and direction of some given force; draw any lines A C, A D, and join C B, D B, and complete the parallelograms A D B E, A C B F. Then by composition of forces the force A B is equivalent to A D and A E, or to A C and A F. Hence it is evident that a given force, as A B, may be resolved into as many pairs of forces as there can be triangles described upon a given straight line A B, or parallelograms about it. And as the forces represented by A D, D B, or A C, C B, may also be resolved into other pairs of forces, it appears that by proceeding in the same manner with the successive pairs of forces a given force may be resolved into an unlimited number of others, acting in all possible directions. See COMPOSITION, FORCE, RESULTANT.—Resolution of nebulae. See under RESOLVE, v. t.—Decision, Determination, Resolution. See under DECISION.—SYN. Analysis, separation, disentangling, dissolution, resolvedness, resoluteness, firmness, constancy, perseverance, steadfastness, fortitude, boldness, decision, purpose, resolve.

Resolutioner (rez-o-lū'shon-ēr), n. One who joins in a resolution or declaration; specifically, one of a party in the Church of Scotland in the seventeenth century.

The two contending parties—the Resolutioners and Protesters—though restrained from flying at each others' throats, continued, in their compulsory restraint, to nourish their hatred of each other.

Resolutionist (rez-o-lū'shon-ist), n. One who makes a resolution. Quart. Rev.

Resolutive (rez-o-lüt-iv), a. Having the power to dissolve or relax. 'A resolutive and discount faculty.' Holland. [Rare.]—Resolutive clause, in Scots law, a clause in a deed of entail, the object of which is to declare that if the heir of entail in possession do any of the things which he is expressly prohibited from doing, such as altering the order of succession, &c., his right to the estate shall cease, and it shall pass on to the next heir.—Resolutive condition, in Scots law, a condition in a sale which does not suspend the completion of the contract, but which resolves the sale if the condition be not purified at the time specified.

Resolvability (rē-zolv'a-bil'it-i), n. The property of being resolvable; the capability of being separated into parts; resolvableness.

The evidence of resolvability seems to me to be rather negative. Lassell.

Resolvable (rē-zolv'a-bl), a. Capable of being resolved; as, (a) capable of being separated into constituent parts; decomposable.

The serum of the blood is resolvable by a small heat. Arbuthnot.

(b) Capable of being recognized as consisting of separate parts. 'Resolvable nebulae.' Whewell. (c) Capable of being reduced into first principles.

The actions of ingratitude seem directly resolvable into pride. South.

(d) Capable of being solved; as, this equation is not resolvable.

The effect is wonderful in all, and the causes best resolvable from observations made in the countries themselves, the parts through which they pass. Sir T. Browne.

Resolvableness (rē-zolv'a-bl-ness), n. State of being resolvable; resolvability.

Resolve (rē-zolv'), v. t. pret. & pp. resolved; ppr. resolving. [L. resolvere, to unloose, to liberate, to open up, to break up, to dissolve, to do away with (hence, to determine, that is, to do away with doubts or disputes)—re, back or again, and solvere, to loose (whence solution, absolve, dissolve, &c.); Fr. résoudre, to resolve, résolutions, we resolve, résolvant, resolving.] 1. To separate the component parts of; to reduce to constituent elements; as, to resolve a body into its component or constituent parts. 'Now resolved to elements again.' Dryden.—2. To separate, as the parts of a complex idea; to reduce to simple parts; to analyse.

Good or evil actions . . . may be resolved into some dictates and principles of the law of nature. Watts.

3. To unravel; to disentangle of perplexities; to remove obscurity by analysis; to clear of difficulties; to explain; as, to resolve questions in moral science; to resolve doubts; to resolve a riddle.

Nor can my dream resolve the doubt. Tennyson.

4. † To inform; to free from doubt or perplexity; to acquaint; to answer.

I cannot brook delay; resolve me now. Shak.

I am not going to resolve him. Shak.

Resolve me, strangers, whence and what you are? Dryden.

5. † To settle in an opinion; to make certain.

Long since we were resolved of your truth, Your faithful service and your toil in war. Shak.

6. To fix in determination or purpose; to determine; to decide; generally in past participle. 'Resolved on death, resolved to die in arms.' Dryden.

I am resolved that thou shalt spend some time With Valentinus in the emperor's court. Shak.

7. To make ready in mind; to prepare.

Quit presently the chapel, or resolve you For more amazement. Shak.

8. To melt; to dissolve.

O, that this too solid flesh would melt, Thaw and resolve itself into a dew. Shak.

9. To form or constitute by resolution, vote, or determination; as, the house resolved itself into a committee of the whole.—

10. To determine on; to express, as an opinion or determination, by resolution and vote; as, this was resolved by the legislature.—11. In music, to cause to move or progress, as a dissonance into any one of the consonant harmonies for which it creates in the ear an expectation.—12. In med. to disperse or scatter; to discuss, as an inflammation or a tumour.—13. In math. to solve. See RESOLUTION.—14. In alg. to bring all the known quantities of an equation to one side, and the unknown quantity to the other.—15. † To relax; to lay at ease. Spenser.—To resolve a nebula, in astron. to magnify it to such a degree that the stars composing it are recognized separately.—SYN. To solve, analyse, explain, unravel, disentangle, determine, decide.

Resolve (rē-zolv'), v. i. 1. To form an opinion or purpose; to determine in mind; to intend; to purpose; as, he resolved to abandon his vicious course of life.

How yet resolves the governor of the town? Shak.

2. To determine by vote; as, the legislature resolved to receive no petitions after a certain day.—3. To melt; to dissolve; to become fluid.

4. To separate into its component parts or into distinct principles; to be ultimately reduced; as, water resolves into vapour; a substance resolves into gas; the question resolves into this.—5. To be settled in opinion; to be convinced.

Let men resolve of that as they please. Locke.

SYN. To determine, decide, conclude, purpose.

Resolve (rē-zolv'), n. 1. † The act of resolving or solving; resolution; solution. Milton.—

2. That which has been resolved on; fixed purpose of mind; settled determination; resolution. 'Many a holy vow and pure resolve.' Tennyson.

He straight revokes his bold resolve. Denham.

On reason build resolve, That column of true dignity in man. Young.

3. The determination or declaration of any corporation or association; a resolution.

Resolvedly (rē-zolv'ed-ly), adv. 1. In a resolved manner; firmly; resolutely; with firmness of purpose.

Let us cheerfully and resolvedly apply ourselves to the working out our salvation. Abp. Sharp.

2. So as to resolve and clear up all doubts and difficulties; satisfactorily. [Rare.]

Of that, and all the progress, more or less, Resolvedly more leisure shall express. Shak.

Resolvedness (rē-zolv'ed-ness), n. Fixedness of purpose; firmness; resolution. 'This resolvedness, this high fortitude in sin.' Dr. H. More.

Resolvend (rē-zolv'end), n. [From L. resolvere, to resolve.] In arith. a number which arises from increasing the remainder after subtraction in extracting the square or cube root.

Resolvent (rē-zolv'ent), a. Having the power to resolve or dissolve; causing solution; solvent.

Resolvent (rē-zolv'ent), n. 1. That which has the power of causing solution.—2. In med. that which has power to disperse inflammation and prevent the suppuration of tumours; a discutient.

Resolver (rē-zolv'ēr), n. One who or that which resolves; as, (a) one who forms a firm resolution. 'That unsincere resolver.' Hammond. (b) That which solves or clears. 'A good resolver of all cases of conscience.' Burnet. (c) That which separates parts; that which dissolves or disperses. 'Universal resolver of mixed bodies.' Boyle.

Reson (rē-zon), n. Reason; ratio; proportion. Chaucer.

Resonance (rē-zo-nans), n. 1. The state or quality of being resonant or resounding; the act of resounding.—2. In acoustics, a prolongation or increase of any sound by reflection, or that property of sonorous bodies by which they vibrate in unison with the vibrations of other bodies and strengthen the original note, as in sounding-boards or the bodies of musical instruments.

The notes of a musical-bow are rendered louder by resonance when it is placed on a table. Hoblyn.

3. In med. a thrilling of the voice more loud than natural, or its existence in a part where it is not heard in health, as detected by auscultation. Dunglison.

Resonancy (rē-zo-nan-si), n. Same as Resonance.

Resonant (rē-zo-nant), a. [L. resonans, resonantis, ppr. of resono—re, again, and sono, to sound.] Capable of returning sound; fitted to resound; resounding; returning sound; echoing back.

His volant touch, Instinct through all proportions low and high, Fled and pursu'd transverse the resonant fugue. Milton.

The streets were resonant with female parties of old and young. De Quincey.

Resonantly (rē-zo-nant-ly), adv. In a resonant or resounding manner.

Resonator (rē-zo-nāt-ēr), n. An instrument for facilitating the analysis of compound sounds. There are various forms, but they are all contrived so that tones above or below the pitch of the resonator will be but imperfectly heard; but if a note be sounded corresponding to the peculiar or proper note of the instrument it will appear greatly intensified.

Resorb (rē-sorb'), v. t. [L. resorbere—re, and sorbere, to drink in.] To swallow up. Young.

Resorbent (rē-sorb'ent), a. Swallowing up. Resorbent ocean's wave. Woodhall.

Resorcine (rē-zor-sin), n. [Resin, alluding to galbanum, and oxyene.] A colourless crystalline compound obtained by fusing galbanum with potassium hydrate, dissolving the fused product in water, neutralizing with sulphuric acid, and mixing the filtered solution with ether. It yields a fine purple red colouring matter and several other dyes.

Resort (rē-zort'), v. i. [Fr. ressortir, to go out again, formerly to seek refuge, to resort, from prefix re, and sor, sortir, to go out, from L. sortiri, to obtain, then to take shelter, to have recourse to, from sors, sortis, lot, fate.] 1. Sir T. Browne.

—To respect persons, also to respect the person, to respect a person, to show undue bias towards; to suffer the opinion or judgment to be influenced or biased by a regard to the outward circumstances of a person, to the prejudice of right and equity.

As Solomon saith, to respect persons is not good, for such a man will transgress for a piece of bread.
Bacon.

Thou shalt not respect the person of the poor.
Lev. xix. 15.

Neither doth God respect any person. 2 Sam. xiv. 14. SYN. To regard, esteem, honour, revere, venerate.

Respect (rê-spêkt'), n. [L. respectus. See the verb.] 1. The act of respecting or noticing with attention; the looking towards; regard; attention. 'But he it well did ward with wise respect.' Spenser.

We pass by common objects or persons without noticing them, whereas we turn back to look again at those which deserve our admiration, our regard, our respect. This was the original meaning of 'respect' and 'respectable.'
Max Müller.

2. The act of holding in high estimation or honour; due attention; regard; the deportment or course of action which proceeds from esteem, regard, or reverence. 'Out of the great respect they bear to beauty.' Shak. 'With all respect and rites of burial.' Shak.

Is there no respect of place, persons, nor time in you?
Shak.

I found the king abandoned to neglect,
Seen without awe, and served without respect. Prior.

3. pl. An expression of respect, esteem, or deference; as, please give him my respects.

4. Good-will; favour.

The Lord had respect unto Abel and to his offering.
Gen. iv. 4.

5. Partial regard; undue bias to the prejudice of justice.

It is not good to have respect of persons in judgment.
Prov. xxiv. 23.

Bacon.

8. Point or particular; matter; feature; point of view.

Everything which is imperfect, as the world must be acknowledged in many respects, had some cause which produced it.
Tillotson.

9. Relation; regard; reference: used especially in the phrase in or with respect to (or of). 'Misgrafted in respect of years.' Shak. 'So that all these four places have one respect and ayme.' Donne.

They believed but one Supreme Deity, which, with respect to the benefits men received from him, had several titles.
Tillotson.

In respect was formerly used to signify relation; comparatively speaking. Comp. in regard.

He was a man, this, in respect, a child. Shak.

In respect of was formerly often used in the sense of relatively to; in comparison with; 'Hector was but a Trojan in respect of this.' Shak. 'In respect of a fine workman I am but a cobbler.' Shak. By modern writers it is apt to be used a little vaguely with such senses as: by reason of; in point of; in consideration of; on account of. Hence from its ambiguity it is as well to avoid the phrase. Compare the following examples.

They are in respect of that responsibility allowed to appoint a commissioner to superintend their local police.
Brougham.

What are the dimensions of Ceylon? Of all islands in the world which we know, in respect of size it most resembles Ireland, being about one-sixth part less.
De Quincey.

They should depress their guns and fire down into the hold, in respect of the vessel attacked standing so high out of the water.
De Quincey.

Respersion† (rê-spêr'shon), n. [L. respersio.] The act of sprinkling or spreading.

Respirability, Respirableness (res'pi-ra-bil'i-ti or res'pi-ra-bil'i-ti, res'pi-ra-bl-nes), n. The quality of being respirable.

Respirable (res'pi-ra-bl or res'pi-ra-bl), a. 1.† That can respire.—2. Capable of or fit for being respired or breathed; as, respirable air.

Respiration (res'pi-râ'shon), n. [L. respiratio, respiratio, from respiro. See RESPIRE.] 1.† The act of breathing again or resuming life.

Till the day
Appear of respiration to the just,
Or vengeance to the wicked. Milton.

2. The act of respiring or breathing; the function by which the nutrient circulating fluid of an organized body is submitted to the influence of air for the purpose of changing its properties. The respiratory function in animals may be mainly considered to be devoted to the excretion of carbonic acid, and to the absorption or inhalation of oxygen gas, by which process the dingy hued venous blood becomes converted into the florid red arterial blood. In the more highly organized animals respiration is carried on by the lungs; in fishes it is effected by the gills. Respiration includes inspiration or inhalation of air, and expiration or exhalation, the combined process taking place in the healthy adult human subject about fourteen to eighteen times per minute, the average quantity of air inhaled being about 30 cubic inches, a slightly smaller quantity being exhaled. Respiration goes on in plants as well as in animals, plants in the presence of light exhaling oxygen and inhaling carbonic acid, and thus reversing the action of the animal. The respiration of fishes (for these cannot live long without air) is effected by the air contained in the water acting on the gills. 3.† Interval. Bp. Hall.—Artificial respiration, respiration induced by artificial means. It is required in cases of drowning, the inhalation of chloroform, noxious gases, and the like. In the case of a person apparently drowned, or in an asphyxiated condition, the following treatment has been recommended:—The patient should be laid on his back on a plane inclined a little from the feet upwards; the shoulders gently raised by a firm cushion placed under them; the tongue brought forward so as to project a little from the side of the mouth. The arms should then be grasped just above the elbows, and raised till they nearly meet above the head; this action imitates inspiration. The arms are then turned down, and firmly pressed for a moment against the sides of the chest; thus imitating a deep expiration.

These two sets of movements should be perseveringly repeated at the rate of fifteen times in a minute.

Respirational (res'pi-râ'shon-al), a. Relating to respiration.

Respirator (res'pi-rât-ér), n. An instrument for breathing through, fitted to cover the mouth, or the nose and mouth, over which it is secured by proper bandages or other appliances. They are mostly used to exclude the passage into the lungs of cold air, smoke, dust, and other noxious substances, and are chiefly used by persons having delicate chests, firemen, cutlers, grinders, and the like. Respirators for persons with weak lungs have several plies of fine gauze made of highly heat-conducting metal, which warms the air as it passes through.

Respiratory (res'pi-ra-to-ri or res'pi-ra-to-ri), a. Pertaining to or serving for respiration; as, respiratory organs.—Respiratory nerves, a series of nerves proceeding from a narrow white fasciculus, situated between the corpus olivare and the corpus retiforme, in the medulla oblongata, and appropriated to the function of respiration.—Respiratory sounds, the sounds made by the air when being inhaled or exhaled. When the lungs are healthy two distinct sounds are heard on applying the ear to the chest, or to a stethoscope applied to the chest, viz. the vesicular sound, otherwise called the respiratory murmur, caused by inspiration, and the bronchial sound produced by the air passing through the bronchial tubes. In a diseased state of the lungs and tubes these sounds are modified, the vesicular sound becoming weaker in one part of the lungs, and abnormally strong in the remainder, and the healthy bronchial sound being changed into one of certain sounds called by the French râles or rattles. The respiratory sounds are of the highest importance in the diagnosis of diseases of the chest and bronchial tubes.—Respiratory surface, the surface of the lungs that comes in contact with the air. This surface is extended by minute subdivision of the lungs into small cavities or air-cells.

Respire (rê-spir'), v.i. pret. & pp. respired; pp. respiring. [Fr. respirer, L. respiro—re, and spiro, to breathe. See SPIRIT.] 1. To breathe; to inhale air into the lungs and exhale it, for the purpose of maintaining animal life.—2. To catch breath; to recover breath.

Breatheless both themselves aside retire;
Where foaming wrath, their cruel tasks they whet,
And trample th' earth the whiles they may respire. Spenser.

3. To rest, as after toil or suffering; to enjoy relief from toil or suffering. Pope.

Respire (rê-spir'), v.t. 1. To breathe in and out, as air; to inhale and exhale; to breathe.

(c) A support for the muzzle of a gun in aiming and firing.—6. In pros. a short pause of the voice in reading; a cesura.—7. In music, an interval of silence occurring in the course of a movement between one sound and another, or the mark or character denoting the interval. The duration of a rest, like the duration of a tone, is indicated by the form of the character representing it, and each note has its corresponding rest. The rests most frequently met with in modern music are:

Breve.	Semibreve.	Minim.	Crotchet.	Quaver.	Semi-quaver.	Demi-semiquaver.	Semidemi-semiquaver.	Dotted Crotchet rest.

A rest like a note may be prolonged by one or more dots.—8. A syllable. B. Jonson.

9. In her. the name given to a figure of doubtful import. It has its name from being taken for a spear-rest, but its shape rather suggests a musical instrument, wherefore it has been called an organ-rest. It is not improbably the representation of some instrument like Pan's pipes.—10. A set, game, or match at tennis.

For wit is like a rest
Held up at tennis, when men do the best
With the best gamesters. Beaumont.

Knock me down, if ever I saw a rest of wit better played than that last in my life. Cibber.

—To set up one's rest, an old phrase borrowed from the once fashionable and favourite game of primero, meaning to stand upon the cards in one's hand in the hopes that they may prove stronger than those of an opponent; hence, to make up one's mind; to stake one's chances; to fix or place one's hope.

They therefore resolved to set up their rest upon that stake, and to go through with it or perish in the attempt. Clarendon.

For the next night, I warrant,
The County Paris hath set up his rest. Shak.

Sea fights have been final to the war, but this is when princes set up their rest upon the battle. Bacon.

SYN. Cessation, pause, intermission, stop, stay, repose, slumber, quiet, ease, quietness, stillness, tranquillity, peacefulness, peace.

Restriving again afresh, with a kick and a wrench together, I freed my long captivated weapon. Guardian.

Resty (res'ti), a. 1.† Restive.—2. Indisposed to exertion; stiff with too much rest. 'Where the master is too resty or too rich to say his own prayers.' Milton.

Weariness
Can snore upon the flint, when resty sloth
Finds the down pillow hard. Shak.

Resubject (rĕ-sub-jekt'), v.t. To subject again.

Resubjection (rĕ-sub-jek'shon), n. A second subjection. Fr. Hall.

Resublimation (rĕ-sub'li-mā'shon), n. A second sublimation.

Resublime (rĕ-sub-līm'), v.t. To sublime again; as, to resublime mercurial sublimate. Newton.

Resudation (rĕ-sū-dā'shon), n. [O.Fr. resudation, from L. resudo, resudatum—re, again, and sudo, to sweat.] The act of sweating again. Cotgrave.

Result (rĕ-zult'), v.i. [Fr. résulter, to result, originally to rebound, from L. resulto, to spring back, to rebound, freq. from resilio—re, back, and salio, to leap.] 1.† To leap back; to rebound. 'The huge round stone, resulting with a bound.' Pope.—2. To proceed, spring, or rise, as a consequence, from facts, arguments, premises, combination of circumstances, &c.; as, evidence results from testimony, or from a variety of concurring circumstances; pleasure results from friendship; harmony results from certain accordances of sounds.

Pleasure and peace naturally result from a holy and good life. Tillotson.

3. To have an issue; to terminate; followed by in; as, this measure will result in good or evil.—4. To come to a decision; to decide or decree, as an ecclesiastical council. [New England.]

Result, and to result, in the technical sense peculiar to American ecclesiastics, deserve to be exploded. Eclat. Rev.

—Resulting force or motion, in dyn. same as Resultant.—Resulting trust, in law, a trust raised by implication in favour of the author of the trust himself, or his representatives.—Resulting use, in law, a use returning by way of implication to the grantor himself.—SYN. To proceed, spring, rise, arise, originate, ensue, eventuate, terminate.

Result (rĕ-zult'), n. [From the verb.] 1.† Resultance; act of flying back.

Sound is produced between the string and the air, by the return or the result of the string. Bacon.

2. Consequence; conclusion; outcome; issue; effect; that which proceeds naturally or logically from facts, premises, or the state of things; as, the result of reasoning; the result of reflection; the result of a consultation; the result of a certain procedure.

And when I weigh this seeming wisdom well,
And prove it in th' infallible result
So hollow and so false. Cowper.

3. The decision or determination of a council or deliberative assembly; resolution; as, the result of an ecclesiastical council.

Rude, passionate, and mistaken results have, at certain times, fallen from great assemblies. Swift.

SYN. Consequence, conclusion, inference, effect, outcome, issue, event.

Resultance (rĕ-zult'āns), n. The act of resulting; that which results; a result. 'That which I call the total resultance.' Reliquiae Wottonianæ.

Resultant (rĕ-zult'ant), a. Existing or following as a result or consequence; especially, resulting from the combination of two or more agents; as, a resultant motion produced by two forces.

Resultant (rĕ-zult'ant), n. 1. In dyn. the force which results from the composition of two or more forces acting upon a body. When the two forces act upon a body in the same line of direction, the resultant is equivalent to the sum of both; when they act in opposite directions, the resultant is equal to their difference, and acts in the direction of the greater. If the lines of direction of the two forces are inclined to each other, then on taking in each direction, from the point where they intersect, a straight line to represent each of the forces respectively, and constructing a parallelogram of which these lines are the adjacent sides, the resultant is represented in intensity and direction by the diagonal of the parallelogram passing through the point of intersection. By combining this resultant with a third force a new resultant will be obtained, and in this manner the resultant of any number of forces may be determined.—2. In math. an eliminant (which see).

Resultate† (rĕ-zult'at), n. A result.

The resultate of their counsel is for the most part direct and sincere. Bacon.

Resultful (rĕ-zult'fūl), a. Having results; effectual.

Résumé (rā'zū-mā), n. [Fr.] A summing up; a recapitulation; a condensed statement; a summary. 'The excellent little résumé thereof.' Kingsley.

Resume (rĕ-zūm'), v.t. pret. & pp. resumed; ppr. resuming. [Fr. résumer, from L. resumo—re, and sumo, to take (whence assume, consume, &c.).] 1. To take again; to take back.

The sun, like this from which our sight we have,
Gaz'd on too long, resumes the light he gave. Sir F. Denham.

They resume what has been obtained fraudulently. Sir W. Davenant.

2. To enter upon or take up again.

Reason resum'd her place, and passion fled. Dryden.

Could the dead, whose dying eyes
Were closed with wail, resume their life,
They would but find in child and wife
An iron welcome when they rise. Tennyson.

3. To take up again after interruption; to begin again; as, to resume an argument or discourse.

Resummon (rĕ-sum'on), v.t. 1. To summon or call again.—2. To recall; to recover. Bacon.

Resummons (rĕ-sum'onz), n. In law, a second summons, or calling a person to answer an action where the first summons is defeated by any occasion.

Resumption (rĕ-sum'shon), n. [L. resumptio, resumptionis—re, back, and sumo, sumptum, to take.] The act of resuming, taking back, or taking again; as, the resumption of a grant; specifically, in law, the taking again by the crown such lands or tenements, &c., as on false suggestion, or other error, had been granted by letters patent.

Resumptive (rĕ-zum'tiv), a. Taking back or again.

Resumptive (rĕ-zum'tiv), n. A restoring medicine; a restorative. Bailey. [Rare.]

Resupinate (rĕ-sū'pī-nā), a. [L. resupinatus, pp. of resupino, to throw on one's back—re, and supino, to lay backwards, from supinus, lying on the back.] 1. Inverted; reversed; appearing as if turned upside down.—2. In bot. so turned or twisted that the parts naturally the undermost become the uppermost, and vice versa; as, a resupinate corolla; a resupinate leaf.

Resupinated (rē-sū'pī-nāt-ed), a. Resupinate.

Resupination (rē-sū'pī-nā'shon), n. [See above.] The state of lying on the back; the state of being resupinate or reversed. 'A resupination of the figure.' Wotton.

Resupine (rē-sū'pīn'), a. Lying on the back. He spake, and downward swayed, fell resupine, With his huge neck asslant. Cowper.

Resupply (rē-sup-plī'), v.t. To supply again. Southey.

Resurgence (rē-sér'jens), n. The act of rising again; resurrection. Coleridge.

Resurgent (rē-sér'jent), a. [L. resurgens, resurgens, ppr. of resurgo—re, again, and surgo, to rise.] Rising again or from the dead. Coleridge.

Resurgent (rē-sér'jent), n. One who or that which rises again; especially, one who rises from the dead. Sydney Smith.

Resurprise (rē-sér'prīz'), n. A second or fresh surprise. The process of this action drew on a resurprise of the castle by the Thiebars. Bacon.

Resurprise (rē-sér'prīz'), v.t. To surprise again; to retake unawares.

Resurrect (rez-ér-ekt'), v.t. [See RESURRECTION.] 1. To take from the grave, as a dead body. [Low.] 2. To restore to life; to reanimate; to bring to public view that which had been lost or forgotten.

Resurrection (rez-ér-ek-shon), n. [Fr., from L. resurrectio, from resurgo, resurrectum—re, again, and surgo, to arise.] 1. A rising again; a springing again into life; a revival, as from a state of ignorance or degradation; as, the resurrection of hopes; a moral resurrection; specifically, a rising from the dead; the revival of the dead of the human race, or their return from the grave, particularly at the general judgment. 'A glorious and joyful resurrection.' Addison.

And have hope toward God . . . that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust. Acts xiv. 15.

2. The state of being risen from the dead; the future state.

In the resurrection they neither marry nor are given in marriage. Mat. xxii. 30.

Resurrectionist (rez-ér-ek-shon-ist), n. One whose business it is to steal bodies from the grave for dissection.

Resurrectionize (rez-ér-ek-shon-īz'), v.t. To raise from the dead; to resurrect. Southey.

Resurrection-man (rez-ér-ek-shon-man), n. Same as Resurrectionist. Dickens.

Resurvey (rē-sér-vā'), v.t. 1. To survey again or anew; to review.—2. To read and examine again.

Once more resurvey These poor rude lines of thy deceased lover. Shak.

Resurvey (rē-sér-vā'), n. A new survey.

Resuscitant (rē-sus-i-tānt), a. and n. Resuscitating; one who or that which resuscitates.

Resuscitate (rē-sus-i-tāt), v.t. pret. & pp. resuscitated; ppr. resuscitating. [L. resuscito, resuscitatus—re, again, and suscito, to rouse up—sus, sub, and cito, to put into quick motion, to incite, to stimulate, a freq. from cio, to summon, to make to go.] To stir up anew; to revivify; to revive; particularly, to recover from apparent death; as, to resuscitate a drowned person; to resuscitate withered plants. 'After death we should be resuscitated.' Glanville.

It is difficult to resuscitate surprise when familiarity has once laid the sentiment asleep. Paley.

No wind has resuscitated the face of the sleeping waters. Lamb.

Resuscitate (rē-sus-i-tāt), v.i. To revive; to come to life again.

As these projects, however often slain, always resuscitate, it is not superfluous to examine one or two of the fallacies by which the schemers impose on themselves. J. S. Mill.

Resuscitation (rē-sus-i-tā'shon), n. The act of resuscitating, or the state of being resuscitated; revival; revivification; restoration to life; the restoring to animation of persons apparently dead, as in cases of drowning, suspended animation from exposure to cold, or from disease. 'The extinction and resuscitation of arts.' Johnson.

The resuscitation of the body from its dust is a supernatural work. Ep. Hall.

Resuscitative (rē-sus-i-tāt-iv), a. Tending to resuscitate; reviving; revivifying; raising from apparent death; reproducing.

Resuscitator (rē-sus-i-tāt-ér), n. One who resuscitates.

Ret (ret), v.t. pret. & pp. retted, ppr. retting. [D. reten, to ret; allied to rot.] To steep or macerate green flax in water in order to separate the fibre by incipient rotting.

Retable (rē-tā'bl), n. In arch. a shelf or ledge behind an altar for holding candles or vases. Sometimes called Super-altar.

Retail (rē-tā'l), v.t. [Fr. retailer, to cut again, to cut often, retail, a piece cut off—re, again, and tailer, to cut, from L. talea, talea, talia, a tally, from L. talea, a stick, a bar (hence also detail, tailor, tally).] To sell in small quantities or parcels: opposed to selling by wholesale; as, to retail cloth or groceries.

The keepers of ale-houses pay for a licence to retail ale and spirituous liquors. Adam Smith.

2. To sell at second hand.

The sage dame, experienced in her trade, By names of toasts, retails each battered jade. Pope.

3. To deal out in small quantities; to tell in broken parts; to tell to many; to tell again; to hand down by report; as, to retail slander or idle reports.

Theminks the truth should live from age to age, As 'twere retail'd to all posterity. Shak.

Retail (rē-tā'l), n. The sale of commodities in small quantities or parcels, or at second hand; a dealing out in small portions. 'These and most other things which are sold by retail.' Adam Smith.

Retail (rē-tā'l), a. Applied to the sale of anything in small quantities or parcels; as, a retail trade. Sydney Smith.

Retailer (rē-tā'l-ér), n. One who retails; one who deals out in small quantities.

The profits of the farmer, of the manufacturer, of the merchant and retailer, are all drawn from the price of the goods which the two first produce, and the two last buy and sell. Adam Smith.

Retailment (rē-tā'l-ment), n. Act of retailing.

Retain (rē-tān'), v.t. [Fr. retenir, L. retineo—re, back, and teneo, to hold.] 1. To hold or keep in possession; to keep from departure or escape; to hold; to detain; to keep; not to lose or part with or dismiss; as, the memory retains ideas which facts or arguments have suggested to the mind. 'Whom I would have retained with me.' Phil. xiii. 13.

They did not like to retain God in their knowledge. Rom. i. 28.

An executor may retain a debt due to him from the testator. Blackstone.

Still Hebron's honour'd, happy soil retains Our royal hero's beauteous, dear remains. Dryden.

2. To keep in pay; to hire; to engage by the payment of a preliminary fee; as, to retain counsel.

A Benedictine convent has now retained the most learned father of their order to write in its defence. Addison.

3. † To withhold; to restrain; to keep back.

He laid him bleeding on the ground, and had killed him if his brother Robert had not retained him, and made him sensible how much more it concerned him to make his escape than pursue his revenge. Sir W. Temple.

Retain† (rē-tān'), v.i. 1. To belong to; to depend on; to pertain. 'A somewhat languid relish retaining to bitterness.' Boyle.

2. To keep; to continue.

No more can impure man retain and move In the pure region of that worthy love. Donne.

Retainable (rē-tān'a-bl), a. Capable of being retained.

Retainal (rē-tān'al), n. The act of retaining. Annual Review. [Rare.]

Retainership† (rē-tān'dér-ship), n. The state of being a retainer or dependant.

It was the policy of these kings to make them all (clergy and nobility) of their own livery or retainership. N. Bacon.

Retainer (rē-tān'ér), n. 1. One who or that which retains. 'One that has forgot the common meaning of words, but an admirable retainer of the sound.' Swift.—2. One who is kept in service; an attendant; a dependant, in a specific sense, a servant, not a domestic, but occasionally attending and wearing his master's livery; as, the retainers of the ancient princes and nobility.

In common law, retainer signifieth a servant not mental nor familiar, that is, not dwelling in his house; but only using or bearing his name and livery. Covell.

Still less would the vast body of tenants and their retainers, who were fed at the castle in time of peace, refuse to carry their pikes and staves into the field of battle. Hallam.

3. In law, (a) a preliminary fee given to a counsel to secure his services, or rather, as it has been said, to prevent the opposite side from engaging them. A retainer is either special or general. A special retainer is for a particular case which is expected to come on. A general retainer is given by a party desirous of securing a priority of claim on the counsel's services for any case which he may have in any court which that counsel attends. Called also Retaining Fee. (b) An authority given to an attorney or solicitor to proceed in an action. (c) The withholding what one has in his hands by virtue of some right.—† The act of keeping dependants, or being in dependence. Bacon.

Retaining (rē-tān'ing), p. and a. Keeping in possession; serving to retain; keeping back; engaging.—Retaining fee, a retainer. See RETAINER, 3.—Retaining wall, a wall that is built to retain a bank of earth from slipping down; a revetment. Called also Retain-wall.

Retention (rē-tān'ment), n. The act of retaining; retention.

Retain-wall (rē-tān'wāl), n. See under RETAINING.

Retake (rē-tāk'), v.t. pret. retook; pp. retaken; ppr. retaking. 1. To take again.

A day should be appointed, when the remembrance should be retaken into consideration. Clarendon.

2. To take from a captor; to recapture; as, to retake a ship or prisoners.

Retaker (rē-tāk'ér), n. One who takes again what has been taken; a recaptor.

Retaliate (rē-tā'l-i-āt), v.t. pret. & pp. retaliated; ppr. retaliating. [L. retaliō, retaliatum, to retaliate—re, in return, and noun talis, like for like, talion, retaliation, from talis, such.] To return the like for; to repay or requite by an act of the same kind as has been received. It is now seldom or never used except in a bad sense, that is, to return evil for evil; as, to retaliate injuries. 'His visit should be retaliated.' Sir T. Herbert. 'Hate with hate again retaliate.' Donne. 'That the kindness he has graciously shown them may be retaliated.' Dryden.

It is unlucky to be obliged to retaliate the injuries of authors, whose works are so soon forgotten that we are in danger of appearing the first aggressors. Swift.

Retaliate (rē-tā'l-i-āt), v.i. To return like for like, especially evil for evil.

Our captain would not salute the city, except they would retaliate. Henry Tounge.

Retaliation (rē-tā'l-i-ā'shon), n. The act of retaliating; the return of like for like; the doing that to another which he has done to us; requital of evil; reprisal; revenge. 'The lex talionis, or law of retaliation.' Blackstone.

They thought it no irreligion to prosecute the severest retaliation or revenge. South.

Formerly it was used also in a good sense, return of good for good. See the verb.

God takes what is done to others as done to himself, and by promise obliges himself to full retaliation. Calamy.

SYN. Requital, reprisal, revenge, repayment, retribution, punishment.

Retaliative (rē-tā'l-i-āt-iv), a. Tending to retaliate; returning like for like; retaliatory; vindictive; revengeful. Quart. Rev.

Retaliatory (rē-tā'l-i-ā-tō-ri), a. Implying retaliation; retaliative; returning like for like; as, retaliatory measures; retaliatory edicts. Canning.

Retard (rē-tārd'), v.t. [Fr. retarder; L. retardo—re, and tardo, to delay, from tardus, slow.] 1. To obstruct in swiftness of course; to keep delaying; to impede; to clog; to hinder; as, to retard the march of an army; to retard the motion of a ship.—Retarded motion, in physics, that which suffers continual diminution of velocity, as the motion of a body projected upwards. If the diminutions of velocity are equal in equal times the motion is said to be uniformly retarded. The laws of retarded motion are the same as those of accelerated motion, only the order is reversed. See under ACCELERATE.

They (metaphysics) were carried still farther, and corrupted all real knowledge, as well as retarded the progress of it. Bolingbroke.

2. To defer; to put off; to render more late; as, to retard the attacks of old age; to retard a rupture between nations. 'To retard a melancholy visit to a person one cannot relieve.' Pope.—SYN. To impede, hinder, obstruct, detain, delay, procrastinate, defer.

Retard† (rē-tārd'), v.i. To stay back. Sir T. Browne.

Retard (rē-tārd'), n. Retardation; used chiefly in the phrase retard of the tide, that is, the interval between the transit of the moon at which a tide originates and the appearance of the tide itself.

Retardation (rê-târ-dâ'shon), n. 1. The act of retarding or abating velocity of motion; hindrance; the act of delaying; putting off or rendering more late; as, the retardation of the motion of a ship.

Out of this a man may devise the means of altering the colour of birds, and the retardation of hoary hairs. Bacon.

2. In physics, the act of hindering the free progress or velocity of a body, and ultimately therefore stopping it. It arises from the opposition of the medium in which the body moves, or from the friction of the surface upon which it moves (see FRICITION, RESISTANCE), or from the action of gravity.—Retardation of mean solar time, the change of the mean sun's right ascension in a sidereal day, by which he appears to hang back, as it were, in his diurnal revolution.—Retardation of the tides. See under ACCELERATION.

3. That which retards; a hindrance; an obstruction. 'Steep hills, sloughs, and other terrestrial retardations.' Sir W. Scott.—4. In music, slackening or retarding the time; also, in harmony, suspension; the prolonging some note of a previous chord into the succeeding one in such a manner that it becomes a discord which is resolved upwards.

Retardative (rê-târ-dât-iv), a. Tending to retard; having power to retard.

Retarder (rê-târ-dêr), n. One that retards, hinders, or delays. 'No inconsiderable retarder,' Glanville.

Retardment (rê-târ-d'ment), n. The act of retarding or delaying. Cowley.

Retch (rech), v.t. [A Sax. hræcan, to retch, to hawk; allied to hraca, the throat, a cough; D. rachelen, to hawk and spit; Icel. hrækja, to hawk, to spit, hrækja, spittle.] To make an effort to vomit; to strain, as in vomiting.

Beloved Julia, hear me still beseeching!
Here he grew inarticulate with retching. Byron.

[Byron would therefore seem to have pronounced the word rech.]

Retch† (rech), v.t. and i. [Weakened form of reck.] To reckon; to heed; to care for. Romance of the Rose.

Retchless† (rech'les), a. [An old weakened form of reckless (which see).] Reckless; careless.

This said, he flung his retchless arms abroad,
And groveling flat upon the ground he lay.
Mir. for Mags.

Retchlessly† (rech'les-li), adv. Recklessly. Drayton.

Retchlessness† (rech'les-nes), n. Recklessness; carelessness. 'Thus, well they may upbraid our retchlessness.' Daniel.

Rete (rê-tê), n. [L., a net.] In anat. a vascular net-work or plexus of vessels.—Rete mirabile, a net-work of blood-vessels in the basis of the brain.—Rete mucosum, in anat. a tissue lying between the epidermis or scarf-skin and the cutis vera or true skin. It is the seat of the colour of the skin, and contains black pigment in the negro.

Retecious (rê-tê'shus), a. Resembling net-work. [Rare.]

Retection† (rê-têk'shon), n. [From L. retego, retectum, to uncover—re, back, and tego, to cover.] The act of disclosing or producing to view something concealed.

This is rather a restoration of a body to its own colour, or a resection of its native colour, than a change. Boyle.

Retell (rê-tel'), v.t. To tell again.

Retent (rê-tent'), n. That which is retained.

Retention (rê-tên'shon), n. [Fr. retention, from L. retentio, retentivus, from retineo, retentum. See RETAIN.] 1. The act of retaining or keeping; the state of being retained. 'A forward retention of custom.' Bacon.—2. The power of retaining; especially, the faculty of the mind by which it retains ideas; memory. 'No woman's heart so big to hold so much; they lack retention.' Shak.

The next chapter (of Locke's second Essay) treats of retention, which is the same as memory, and which we see, at once, can only occupy itself with ideas already in the mind. J. D. Morrell.

Hence—3.† That which preserves impressions, as a tablet. 'That poor retention could not so much hold.' Shak. [Rare.]—

4. In med. (a) the power of retaining, as in the stomach or bladder. (b) A morbid accumulation of solid or liquid matter in vessels of the body or cavities intended to contain it only for a time.—5. The act of withholding; reserve; restraint.

His life I gave him, and did thereto add
My love without retention or restraint. Shak.

6.† The state of being confined; custody; confinement.

To send the old and miserable king
To some retention and appointed guard. Shak.

7. In Scots law, a lien; the right of withholding a debt or retaining property until a debt due to the person claiming this right be duly paid.

Retentis (rê-tent'is), [L., ablative pl. of retentus, pp. of retineo, to hold back. See RETAIN.] Things retained.—To be kept in retentis, to be kept among things retained or reserved for some future purpose.—To lie in retentis, in Scots law, to lie in proof, as the examinations of witnesses, which, in certain cases, are taken before the case is ripe for trial.

Retentive (rê-tent'iv), a. [Fr. retentif. See RETAIN.] Having the power to retain; as, a retentive memory; the retentive faculty; the retentive force of the stomach; a body retentive of heat or moisture.

Nor airless dungeon, nor strong links of iron,
Can be retentive to the strength of spirit. Shak.

Retentive (rê-tent'iv), n. That which retains or confines; restraint.

Secret chinks readily conspire with outward retentives. Ep. Hall.

Retentively (rê-tent'iv-li), adv. In a retentive manner.

Retentiveness (rê-tent'iv-nes), n. The quality of being retentive; as, retentiveness of memory.

Retenue†, n. Retinue.—At his retenue, retained by him. Chaucer.

Retepora (rê-tê-po-ra), n. [L. rete, a net, and porus, a pore.] A genus of zoophytes of the class Polyzoa, the cells of which are immersed in a flattened foliaceous expansion pierced like net-work. The typical species (R. cellulosa), found in the Indian and Mediterranean Seas, is known by the name of Neptune's ruffles. Fossil all formations.

Retepore (rê-tê-pôr), n. One of the genus Retepora.

Meanwhile welcome joy and feast, Midnight shout and revelry, Tipsy dance and jollity. Milton.

Revendicate (rê-ven'di-kât), v.t. pret. & pp. revendicated; ppr. revendicating. [Fr. revendiquer—re, again, and vendiquer, to claim or challenge. L. vindico, vindicatum. See VINDICATE.] To reclaim; to demand the surrender of, as of goods taken away or detained illegally.

Revendication (rê-ven'di-kâ'shon), n. The act of revendicating or demanding the restoration of anything taken away or retained illegally.

Revenge (rê-venj'), v.t. pret. & pp. revenged; ppr. revenging. [O.Fr. revenger, revengier, Mod.Fr. revancher—re, in return, and O.Fr. vengier, Mod.Fr. venger, to avenge, from L. vindico, vindicare, to vindicate. See VINDICATE.] 1. To take vengeance for or on account of; to exact satisfaction for, under a sense of wrong or injury; to exact retribution for or for the sake of; to inflict punishment for; to avenge: with the wrong done, or the person or thing wronged, as the object.

O Lord, . . . visit me, and revenge me of my persecutors. Jer. xv. 15.

And thou shalt find a king that will revenge Lord Stafford's death. Shak.

Come Antony, and young Octavius, come Revenge yourselves alone on Cassius. Shak.

The gods are just, and will revenge our cause. Dryden.

2. To inflict injury for or on account of, in a spiteful, wrong, or malignant spirit, and in order to gratify one's bitter feelings; as, eager to revenge himself; to revenge his supposed wrongs. From the use of the verb with reflexive pronouns the expression to be revenged often has the sense of to revenge one's self; to take vengeance; as, I'll be revenged on him for it.

Revenge (rê-venj'), v.i. To take vengeance. 'And if you wrong us, shall we not revenge?' Shak.

Revenge (rê-venj'), n. [See the verb.] 1. The act of revenging; the executing of vengeance; something in the way of retribution; retaliation. 'The beginning of revenges upon the enemy.' Deut. xxxii. 42.

And thus the whirligig of time brings in his revenges. Shak.

2. The angry, spiteful, or malignant return of an injury received; the deliberate infliction of pain or injury on a person in return for an injury received from him. 'Woman-like, taking revenge too deep.' Tennyson.

3. The passion which is excited by an injury done or an affront given; the desire of inflicting pain on one who has done an injury; as, to glut revenge.

The indulgence of revenge tends to make men more savage and cruel. Kames.

—To give one his revenge, to offer one a return-match after he has been defeated, as at chess or billiards.—Revenge, Vengeance, Retribution. Revenge is the carrying into effect of a bitter desire to injure an enemy for a wrong done to one's self, or those closely connected with one's self, and is a purely personal feeling. It generally has reference to our equals or superiors, and the revengeful feeling is felt all the more bitterly where it cannot be gratified. Vengeance may arise from no personal feeling, but may be taken for another's wrong as well as one's own. It involves the idea of wrathful retribution, more or less just. It is inflicted on inferiors; as, a slave murders a harsh master out of revenge, and the relatives take vengeance on him in return. Vengeance is the word always used for God's just wrath against sinners. Retribution does not, like the other two, so much concern the person inflicting the injury, but the injury itself. It is, as it were, the natural or due return for a capital of bad deeds previously invested. Any evil result happening to the perpetrator of a crime in consequence of the crime committed is said to be a retribution. Revengeance† (rê-venj'ans), n. Revenge; vengeance.

Revengeful (rê-venj'ful), a. Full of revenge or a desire to inflict pain or evil for injury received; harbouring revenge; vindictive; wreaking revenge. 'If thy revengeful heart can not forgive.' Shak.

May my hands Never brandish more revengeful steel Over the glittering helmet of my foe. Shak.

SYN. Vindictive, vengeful, resentful, spiteful, malicious.

Revengefully (rê-venj'ful-ly), adv. In a revengeful manner; by way of revenge; vindictively; with the spirit of revenge.

He smiled revengefully, and leaped Upon the floor, thence gazing at the skies, His eyeballs fiery red and glowing vengeance. Dryden.

Revengefulness (rê-venj'ful-nes), n. Vindictiveness.

Revengeless (rê-venj'les), a. Unrevenged. 'Leave his woes revengeless.' Marston.

Multitudinous echoes awoke and died in the distance, Over the watery flow, and beneath the reverberant branches. Longfellow.

Reverberate (rê-vêr'bër-ât), v.t. pret. & pp. reverberated; ppr. reverberating. [L. reverbero, reverberatum—L. re, back, and verbero, to lash, to beat, from verber, a lash, a whip, a rod.] 1. To return, as sound; to send back; to echo. 'Like an arch, reverberates the voice again.' Shak.—2. To send or cast back; to reflect; as, to reverberate rays of light or heat.—3. To send or drive back; to repel from side to side; as, flame reverberated in a furnace. Hence—4.† To fuse, as by heat intensified by being reverberated. 'Reverberated into glass.' Sir T. Browne.

Reverberate (rê-vêr'bër-ât), v.i. 1. To be driven back; to be repelled, as rays of light; to echo, as sound.—2. To resound.

And even at hand, a drum is ready brac'd, That shall reverberate all as well as thine. Shak.

Now rings the bell, nine times reverberating. Longfellow.

Reverberate† (rê-vêr'bër-ât), a. 1. Cast back or reflected. 'The reverberate sound.' Drayton.—2. Driving or beating back; reverberating; reverberant. 'The reverberate hills.' Shak. 'A reverberate glass.' B. Jonson.

Reverberation (rê-vêr'bër-â'shon), n. [See REVERBERATE.] 1. The act of reverberating, or of driving or sending back; particularly, the act of reflecting light, heat, or sound, more especially sound. 'The several reverberations of the same image, from two opposite looking-glasses.' Addison.—2. A sound reverberated or echoed.—3. The circulation of flame in a specially formed furnace, or its return from the top to the bottom of the furnace to produce an intense heat when calcination is required.

Reverberative (rê-vêr'bër-ât-iv), a. Tending to reverberate; reflective; reverberant.

This reverberative influence is what we have intended above as the influence of the mass upon its centres. Is. Taylor.

Revererator (rê-vêr'bër-ât-ër), n. 1. He who or that which reverberates.—2. A reflecting lamp.

Reverberatory (rê-vêr'bër-a-to-ri), a. Producing reverberation; acting by reverberation; reverberating; as, a reverberatory furnace or kiln.—Reverberatory furnace, a furnace so constructed that the material (as ores, metals, &c.) to be operated on can be heated without coming in direct contact with the fuel. It consists essentially of three parts—namely, a fireplace, a, at one end; in the middle a flat bed or sole, b, on which the material to be heated is placed; and at the other end a chimney, c, to carry off the smoke or fume. Between the fireplace and the bed a low partition wall or fire-bridge is placed, and the whole built over with a low arch, dipping towards the chimney. The flame plays over the fire-bridge, and is reflected or reverberated on the material beneath, hence the name. The reverberatory furnace gives free access of air to the material, and is thus employed for oxidizing impurities in metals and other similar purposes.

Section of Reverberatory Furnace.

Reverberatory (rê-vêr'bêr-a-to-ri), n. Same as Reverberatory Furnace. See the adjective.

Revere (rê-vêr'), v.t. pret. & pp. revered; ppr. revering. [Fr. révéler, L. revereor—re, and vereor, to feel awe of, to fear.] To regard with fear or awe, mingled with respect and affection; to venerate; to reverence; to honour in estimation. 'Marcus Aurelius, whom he rather revered as his father than treated as his partner in the empire.' Addison.

Revered, beloved—O you that hold
A nobler office upon earth
Than anns, or power of brain, or birth
Could give the warrior kings of old. Tennyson.

SYN. To venerate, adore, reverence.

Reverence (rev'er-ens), n. [Fr. révérence, from L. reverentia. See REVERE.] 1. Deep respect and esteem mingled with affection; awe and respect combined; veneration.

When quarrels and factions are carried openly it is a sign that the reverence of government is lost. Bacon.
The fear acceptable to God is a filial fear, an awful reverence of the divine nature, proceeding from a just esteem of his perfections, which produces in us an inclination to his service and an unwillingness to offend him. Dr. F. Rogers.

A thousand claims to reverence closed
In her as Mother, Wife, and Queen. Tennyson.

Reverence is nearly equivalent to veneration, but expresses something less of the same emotion. It differs from mere awe in that it is not akin to the feeling of dread or terror, while also implying a certain amount of love or affection. We feel reverence for a parent and for an upright magistrate, but we stand in awe of a tyrant.—2. An act of respect or obeisance; a bow or courtesy. 'Tell on his face and did reverence.' 2 Sam. ix. 6.

But yesterday the word of Cæsar might
Have stood against the world; now lies he there,
And none so poor to do him reverence. Shak.

3. Reverend character; hence, a reverend personage; a common title of the clergy, generally used with the pronouns his, your, &c. 'Forced to lay my reverence by.' Shak. 'A clergyman of holy reverence.' Shak.—Saving your reverence, with all respect to you: a phrase used to introduce an objectionable expression.

Sir, she came in great with child; and longing, saving your honour's reverence, for stewed prunes. Shak.

SYN. Honour, veneration, awe, adoration.
Reverence (rev'er-ens), v.t. pret. & pp. reverenced; ppr. reverencing. To regard with reverence; to regard with fear, mingled with respect and affection.

Those that I reverence, those I fear, the wise. Shak.
They will reverence my son. Mat. xxi. 37.

And (let) the wife see that she reverence her husband. Eph. v. 33.

Reverencer (rev'er-ens-ér), n. One that regards with reverence.

The Athenians, quite sunk in their affairs, were become great reverencers of crowned heads. Swift.

Reverend (rev'er-end), a. [Fr. révérend, from L. reverendus, to be revered. See REVERE.] 1. Worthy of reverence; entitled to respect, mingled with fear and affection; as, reverend and gracious senators.

A reverend sire among them came. Milton.

2. A title of respect given to clergymen or ecclesiastics, and sometimes to Jewish rabbis; as, the reverend Mr. So-and-so. In England deans are very reverend, bishops right reverend, and archbishops most reverend. The religious in Catholic countries are styled reverend fathers; abbesses, prioresses, &c., reverend mothers. In Scotland, the principals of the universities, if clergymen, and the moderator of the General Assembly for the time being, are styled very reverend; a synod is styled very reverend, and the General Assembly venerable.

Reverently (rev'er-en-shal-li), adv. 1. In a reverent manner; with reverence; with respectful regard.

Chide him for faults, and do it reverently. Shak.

2. With veneration; with fear of what is great or terrifying.

So reverently men quit the open air
When thunder speaks the angry gods abroad. Dryden.

Reverer (rê-vêr'ér), n. One who reveres or venerates.

Reverie (rev'er-i), n. [Fr. réverie, from réver, to dream, a word of doubtful origin.] A waking dream; a brown study; a loose or irregular train of thoughts occurring in musing or meditation. It is apparently, in all cases, due to an exaltation or concentration of the faculty of attention. The mind may be occupied, according to the age, tastes, or pursuits of the individual, by calculations, by profound metaphysical speculations, by fanciful visions, or by such trifling and transitory objects as to make no impression on consciousness, so that the period of reverie is left an entire blank in the memory. The most obvious external feature marking this state is the apparent unconsciousness or partial perception of external objects. It is generally, and always at the commencement, at the control of the will.

There are reveries and extravagancies which pass through the minds of wise men as well as fools. Addison.

We sat,
But spoke not, rapt in nameless reverie,
Perchance upon the future man. Tennyson.

Reverist (rev'er-ist), n. One who is sunk in a reverie; one who indulges in or gives way to reverie. Chambers's Ency.

Revers,† a. [Fr.] Reverse; contrary. Chaucer.

Reversal (rê-vêrs'al), n. The act of reversing: (a) the act of moving or causing to move in a contrary direction; as, the reversal of a steam-engine. (b) A change or overthrowing; as, the reversal of a judgment, which amounts to an official declaration that it is false; the reversal of an attainer or of an outlawry, by which the sentence is rendered void.

Reverse (rê-vêrs'), v.t. pret. & pp. reversed; ppr. reversing. [Fr. revertor, reversus—re, back, and verto, to turn.] 1. To turn or put in an opposite or contrary direction or position; to turn upside down; as, to reverse a pyramid or cone. 'My empty glass reversed.' Tennyson.—2. To alter to the opposite; to make quite the contrary, or have contrary bearings or relations.

With what tyranny custom governs men; it makes that reputable in one age, which was a vice in another, and reverses even the distinctions of good and evil. Dr. F. Rogers.

She reversed the conduct of the celebrated vicar of Bray. Sir W. Scott.

3. To overturn; to subvert; as, to reverse the state. Pope.—4. To overthrow; to make void; to annul; to repeal; to revoke; as, to reverse a judgment, sentence, or decree.

Is Clarence dead? The order was reversed. Shak.

Those seem to do best, who taking useful hints from facts, carry them in their minds to be judged of by what they shall find in history to confirm or reverse these imperfect observations. Locke.

5.† To recall; to renew; to cause to return. Spenser.—6.† To turn away or back. Spenser.—7. In mach. to cause to revolve in a contrary direction; to change the motion of, as the crank of an engine, or that part to which the piston-rod is attached.—SYN. To overturn, overset, invert, overthrow, subvert, repeal, annul, revoke.

Reverse† (rê-vêrs'), v.i. To return; to come back. Spenser.

Reverse (rê-vêrs'), n. 1. That which is presented when anything, as a lance, gun, &c., is reverted, or turned in the direction opposite to what is considered its natural position. 'He did so with the reverse of his lance.' Sir W. Scott.—2. A complete change or turn of affairs: sometimes (a) in a good sense.

Meantime, by a reverse of fortune, Stephen becomes rich. Lamb.

Generally (b) in a bad sense; a change for the worse; a misfortune; as, by an unexpected reverse of circumstances an affluent man is reduced to poverty.

To pine in that reverse of doom,
Which sicken'd every living bloom,
And blurr'd the splendour of the sun. Tennyson.

3. A cessation of success; a check; a defeat; as, the troops met with a reverse.—4. A back-handed stroke in fencing. 'To see thee pass thy punto, thy stock, thy reverse, thy distance, thy montant.' Shak.—5. That which is directly opposite or contrary; a contrary; an opposite: generally with the.

Revoluble (rē-vōl'ū-bl), a. Capable of revolving; rotatory. 'His revoluble orbs.' Chapman.

Revolute (rē-vōlūt), a. [L. revolutus, from revolvere. See REVOLVE.] Rolled or curled backwards or downwards; used especially in bot. and zool.; thus, revolute foliation or leafing is when the sides of the leaves in the bud are rolled spirally back or toward the lower surface.

Revolution (rev-ō-lū'shon), n. [L. revolutio, revolutio, a revolving, from revolvere, revolutum, to revolve. See REVOLVE.] 1. The act of revolving or rotating; rotation; the circular motion of a body on its axis; a course or motion which brings every point of the surface or periphery of a body back to the place at which it began to move; as, the revolution of a wheel. —2. The course or motion of a body round a centre; the act of moving in a circular course; as, the revolution of the earth round the sun; hence, a course or motion of anything which returns to the same point or state; as, the revolution of day and night, or of the seasons. —3. A continued course, or a space of time marked by some revolution, or by a succession of similar events; the passage of time; hence, a change produced by time. 'The revolution of a single age.' Abp. Wake.

O God! that one might read the book of fate,
And see the revolution of the times
Make mountains level. Shak.

4. A total or radical change of circumstances or of system. 'A complete revolution throughout the department which was under his direction.' Macaulay.

What various revolutions in our art
Since Thespis first sold ballads in a cart. Foot.

Specifically—5. A sudden and violent change of government, or in the political constitution of a country, mainly brought about by internal causes. A gradual and pacific internal change is called a reform, while a change brought about by external causes is generally of the nature of a conquest. The term revolution, in English history, is applied distinctively to the convulsion by which James II. was driven from the throne in 1688. In this sense the word is often used adjectively.

The election generally fell upon men of revolution principles. Smollett.

The term, the French revolution, is usually applied to the violent reaction against the absolutism which had supplanted the old feudal institutions of the country, which began in 1789. The subsequent French revolutions are usually indicated by their respective dates, 1830, 1848, 1851, 1870, 1871. The American war of independence is often called a revolution. —6. A rolling or other motion backwards; the return to a point before occupied.

Come thundering back with dreadful revolution
On my defenceless head. Milton.

7. In geom. the motion of a point, line, or surface about a centre or axis, so that the moving point forms a curve, the moving line a surface, and the moving surface a solid; thus, the revolution of an ellipse round one of its axes generates an ellipsoid; the revolution of a semicircle about the diameter generates a sphere; such solids being called solids of revolution. —8. In astron. (a) one complete circuit made by a heavenly body round any fixed point or centre; as, a revolution of a planet in its orbit. (b) The period in which a planet, satellite, or comet returns to the place in its orbit from which we estimate its setting out. (c) The motion of rotation of any heavenly body about its axis. (d) The period of one complete rotation of a heavenly body about its axis.

Revolutionary (rev-ō-lū'shon-ā-ri), a. 1. Pertaining to a revolution in government; as, a revolutionary war; revolutionary crimes or disasters. —2. Tending to produce a revolution; as, revolutionary measures.

Revolutionary (rev-ō-lū'shon-ā-ri), n. A revolutionist; a person disposed towards a revolution.

Dumfries was a Tory town, and could not tolerate a revolutionist. Prof. Wilson.

Revolutioner (rev-ō-lū'shon-ēr), n. One who is engaged in effecting a revolution; a revolutionist.

The people were divided into three parties, namely, the Williamites, the Jacobites, and the discontented revolutioners. Smollett.

Revolutionism (rev-ō-lū'shon-izm), n. Revolutionary principles. North Brit. Rev.

Revolutionist (rev-ō-lū'shon-ist), n. One engaged in effecting a change of government; the favourer of a revolution. Burke.

Revolutionize (rev-ō-lū'shon-iz), v. t. pret. & pp. revolutionized; ppr. revolutionizing. 1. To bring about a revolution in; to effect a change in the political constitution of; as, to revolutionize a government. 'To revolutionize his native land.' Crabb. —2. To effect an entire change of principles in.

The Gospel, if received in truth, has revolutionized his soul. J. M. Mason.

Revolute (rē-vōlūt-iv), a. 1. Turning over; revolving; cogitating. 'Being so concerned with the inquisitive and revolute soul of man.' Feltham. —2. In bot. same as Revolute.

Revolve (rē-vōlv'), v. t. pret. & pp. revolved; ppr. revolving. [L. revolvere—re, again, and volvere, to roll.] 1. To turn or roll round an axis; to rotate; as, the earth or a wheel revolves on its axis. —2. To move round a centre; to circle; to move in a course such as to bring what moves round to the same place, state, or condition; as, the planets revolve round the sun. 'In the same circle we revolve.' Tennyson. —3. To pass away in cycles or periods; as, the centuries revolve; the revolving years. —4. To fall back; to return; to devolve.

On the desertion of an appeal, the judgment does, ipso jure, revolve to the judge a quo. Ayliffe.

Revolve (rē-vōlv'), v. t. 1. To roll round; to cause to turn round.

Then in the east her turn she shines
Revolved on heaven's great axle. Milton.

2. To turn over and over in the mind; to meditate on; as, to revolve thoughts in the mind.

Long stood Sir Bedivere
Revolving many memories. Tennyson.

Revolvency (rē-vōlv'en-si), n. State, act, or principle of revolving; revolution.

Its own revolvency upholds the world. Cowper.

Revolver (rē-vōlv'ēr), n. One who or that which revolves; specifically, a firearm (generally a pistol) having a revolving barrel or breech cylinder so constructed as to discharge several shots in quick succession without being reloaded. In some pistols the barrel has a plurality of bores into which the charges are inserted, and from which they are discharged, but more commonly the weapon has a cylinder at the base of the barrel containing several chambers (usually six), in which the charges are placed, and all are fired through the single tube which constitutes the barrel; in all the rotation of the chambers, bringing their bores in a line with the bore of the barrel, is caused by devices actuated by the lock mechanism. In some improved forms of the weapon the chambers are loaded at the breech with metal cartridges, which contain the cap and bullet as well as the charge. The revolver principle has also been applied to rifles, and to guns for throwing small projectiles, as in the Gatling-gun of the United States service, and the mitrailleuse of the French. The principle is not new, arms similar in construction having been made four centuries ago, but it was first made practically available in 1835 by Colonel Colt of the United States.

Revolving (rē-vōlv'ing), p. and a. Turning; rolling; moving round.—Revolving light, in lighthouses, a light usually produced by the revolution of a frame with three or four sides having reflectors of a larger size than those used for a fixed light, grouped on each side with their axes parallel. The revolution exhibits once in one or two minutes as may be required, a light gradually increasing to full strength, and then decreasing to total darkness; or a red and a white light may be exhibited alternately.—Revolving pistol. See REVOLVER.—Revolving storms or cyclones, violent storms which, while advancing bodily in a definite direction, rotate about an axis with great rapidity.

Revomit (rē-vōm'it), v. t. To vomit or pour forth again; to reject from the stomach.

They might cast it up and take more, vomiting and revomiting what they drink. Hakewill.

Revulse (rē-vuls'), v. t. To affect by revulsion; to pull or draw back; to withdraw.

Nothing is so effectual as frequent vomits to withdraw and revulse the peccant humours from the relaxed bowels. Cheyne.

Revulsion (rē-vul'shon), n. [Fr. révulsion, from L. revulsio, from revellere, revulsio—re, again, and vellere, to pull.] 1. The act of drawing or holding back or away from; violent separation; abstraction.

The revulsion of capital from other trades of which the returns are more frequent. Ad. Smith.

2. In med. the act of turning or diverting the principle of a disease from an organ in which it seems to have taken its seat. Rubefacients, vesicatories, bleeding in the foot, &c., are often used for this purpose. —3. A sudden and violent change, particularly of feeling. 'A sudden and violent revulsion of feeling.' Macaulay.

The revulsion of feeling produced by this cordial burst was more than the agitated man could bear. Mrs. Trollope.

Revulsive (rē-vul'siv), a. Having the power of revulsion; tending to revulsion.

Revulsive (rē-vul'siv), n. That which has the power of withdrawing; specifically, a medicine used for the purpose of revulsion.

Rewake (rē-wāk'), v. i. and t. To wake again. Chaucer.

Rewaken (rē-wāk'n), v. t. and i. To waken again. 'Rewaken with the dawning soul.' Tennyson.

Reward (rē-wārd'), v. t. [O. Fr. rewarder, re-guarder, from re and the Teutonic word ward = guard, the meaning being probably influenced by O. Fr. reveredoner, requerre-doner, from querdon (which see).] To give in return, either good or evil; to requite; to recompense; commonly in a good sense; to bestow a recompense, remuneration, or token of favour upon; to bestow a guerdon. When evil or suffering is returned for injury or wickedness, reward signifies to punish; to take vengeance on.

Thou hast rewarded me good, whereas I have rewarded thee evil. 1 Sam. xxiv. 17.

I will render vengeance to mine enemies; and will reward them that hate me. Deut. xxxiii. 41.

The Son of man will come in the glory of his Father with his angels; and then he shall reward every man according to his works. Mat. xvi. 27.

I'll follow, as they say, for reward. He that rewards me, God reward him! Shak.

SYN. To recompense, compensate, remunerate, pay, requite, punish.

Reward (rē-wārd'), n. 1. That which is given in return for good or evil done or received, especially that which comes in return for some good; a token or gift of regard; recompense.

Rewards and punishments do always presuppose something willingly done well or ill, without which respect, though we may sometimes receive good, yet then it is only a benefit, not a reward. Hooker.

In a bad sense, punishment or requital of evil.

What reward shall be given or done unto thee thou false tongue? even mighty and sharp arrows, with hot burning coals. Ps. cxv. 3 (Common Prayer).

2. The fruit of men's labour or works.

The dead know not anything, neither have they any more a reward. Ecc. ix. 5.

3. A sum of money offered for taking or detecting a criminal, or for the recovery of anything lost. It is illegal to offer, or to publish the offer of, a reward for the recovery of stolen goods.—4.† Regard; respect. 'Take reward of thin owen value.' Chaucer.—SYN. Recompense, compensation, remuneration, pay, requital, retribution, punishment.

Rewardable (rē-wārd'a-bl), a. Capable of being rewarded; worthy of recompense. 'Rewardable or punishable.' Hooker.

Rewardableness (rē-wārd'a-bl-nes), n. The state of being worthy of reward.

What can be the praise or rewardableness of doing that which a man cannot chuse but do?

Dr. F. Goodman.

Rewardably (rē-wārd'a-bl), adv. In a rewardable manner.

Rewarder (rē-wārd'ēr), n. One who rewards; one that requites or recompenses. 'A liberal rewarder of his friends.' Shak.

Rewardful (rē-wārd'fūl), a. Yielding reward; rewarding. 'Nor heed rewardful toil, nor seek praise.' Thomson. [Rare.]

Rewardless (rē-wārd'les), a. Having no reward.

Rewe, † v. t. or †. To rue. Chaucer.
Rewel-bone, † Ruell-bone† (rū'el-bōn), n. A word of doubtful meaning used by Chaucer in the line:

His sadel was of rewel-boon.

This may mean that the saddle was ornamented with round slices of bone (Fr. rouelle, dim. of roue, a wheel); Skeat conjectures that rewel-boon is simply bone that has been rounded and made smooth.

Rewet (rū'ēt), n. [Fr. rouet, a spinning-wheel, a kind of gun-lock, dim. of roue, a wheel, L. rota.] The lock of a gun. [Rare.]

Rewin (rē-wīn'), v. t. To win again.

The Palatinate was not worth the rewinning.

Fuller.

Reword (rē-wērd'), v. t. 1. To repeat in the same words.

It is not madness

That I have utter'd: bring me to the test, And I the matter will reword, which madness Would gambol from.

Shak.

2. To re-echo. 'A hill whose concave womb reworded a plentiful story from a sisting vale.' Shak.

Rewrite (rē-rit'), v. t. To write a second time.

Write and rewrite, blot out, and write again, And for its swiftness ne'er applaud your pen.

Young.

Rex (reks), n. [L. rex.—To play rex, † to play the king; to handle roughly; to overthrow completely.

Think ye it to be the greatest indignity to the queene that may be, to suffer such a caytiffe to play such rex.

Spenser.

Reye, † n. [D. ry, rij, G. reigen, reihen, a dance.] An old quick dance, in use among the Dutch. Chaucer.

Reynard (rā'nārd). See RENARD.

Rhabarbarate (ra-bār'ba-rāt'), a. [See RHUBARB.] Impregnated or tintured with rhubarb. Floyer.

Rhabarbarin, Rhabarbarine (ra-bār'ba-rīn), n. [L. rhabarbarum. See RHUBARB.] Same as Chrysophanic Acid. See CHRYSOPHANIC.

Rhabarbarum (ra-bār'ba-rum), n. [L.] Rhubarb (which see).

Rhabdocœla (rab'dō-sē-lā), n. pl. [Gr. rhabdos, a rod, and koilos, hollow.] A section of Scolecida, or animals belonging to the sub-order Planarida and order Turbellaria. See PLANARIDA.

Rhabdoidal (rab-doi'dal), n. [Gr. rhabdos, a rod, and eidos, resemblance.] Rod-like; specifically, in anat. of or pertaining to the sagittal suture, or that which unites the parietal bones.

Rhabdolith (rab'dō-lith), n. [Gr. rhabdos, a rod, and lithos, a stone.] A minute calcareous organic body, of rod-like shape, occurring in the globigerina ooze.

Rhabdology (rab-dō-lo-jī), n. [Gr. rhabdos, a staff or wand, and logos, discourse.] The art or art of computing or numbering by Napier's rods or Napier's bones.

Rhabdomancy (rab'dō-man-sī), n. [Gr. rhabdos, a rod, and mantia, divination.] Divination by a rod or wand; specifically, the discovery of things concealed in the earth, as ores of metals, springs of water, and the like, by a divining-rod.

Rhabdopleura (rab'dō-plū-rā), n. pl. [Gr. rhabdos, a staff, and pleuron, a rib.] A sub-order of marine polyzoa, having the primitive bud inclined between two fleshy lobes or valve-like plates, attached along their dorsal margin, and giving exit in front to the rudimentary lophophore or disc which bears the tentacles. In the polyzoa belonging to this sub-order the organism is attached or adherent to fixed objects, and produces a chitinous or horny rod on its adherent side. The tentacles are arranged in a horse-shoe shape.

Rhabdosphere (rab'dō-sfēr), n. [Gr. rhabdos, a rod, and sphaira, a sphere.] A minute organic body, sphere-like in shape, and bristling with rods, occurring in the depths of the Atlantic.

Rhachialgia (rā-ki-a'l-jī-a), n. See RACHIALGIA.

Rhachis (rā'kīs), n. In bot. see RACHIS.

Rhachitis (ra-ki'tis), n. The rickets. See RACHITIS.

Rhadamanthine, Rhadamantine (rad-a-man'thin, rad-a-man'tin), a. [From Rhadamanthus, son of Jupiter, appointed, on account of his justice, one of the three judges of the lower world.] Severely or rigorously just. 'Your doom is Rhadamanthine.' Carlyle.

Rhætian (rē'shi-an), a. and n. Of or pertaining to the ancient Rhæti, or their country Rhætia; as, the Rhætian Alps, now the country of Tyrol and the Grisons. As a noun, a native or inhabitant of Rhætia.

Rhætic (rē'tik), a. Of or belonging to the Rhætian Alps; specifically, appellation of a series of strata extensively developed in the Rhætian Alps, and constituting the uppermost portion of the triassic, or, according to others, the lowest of the liassic or oolitic group. The strata have also the name of passage-beds from lying between the trias and lias, and are more highly fossiliferous than any of the other members of the triassic period.

Rhæto-Romanic (rē'tō-rō-man'ik), a. and n. Belonging to, or that member of, the Romance family of tongues spoken in South Switzerland and in the districts to the north of the Adriatic.

Rhamadan (ram'a-dan), n. Same as Ramadan.

Rhamnaceæ (ram-nā'sē-ē), n. pl. [From typical genus Rhamnus (which see).] A nat. order of exogenous plants, remarkable for having a valvate calyx, hooded petals, opposite to which their stamens are inserted, and a superior or half-inferior fruit which is either dry or fleshy. The species are erect or climbing, often spiny, trees or shrubs, with small greenish inconspicuous flowers, and simple, alternate or opposite, often three to five nerved leaves. They are found over nearly all the world except in the arctic zone. The berries of several species of Rhamnus are violent purgatives, while the fruit of some, as the jujube, is harmless and eatable. The berries of Rhamnus infectorius yield a yellow dye, and R. Frangula yields excellent charcoal for gunpowder.

Rhamnus (ram'nus), n. [Gr. rhamnos, a kind of prickly shrub or thorn, perhaps buckthorn or Christ's thorn.] A widely diffused genus of shrubs, containing about sixty species, natives of temperate and tropical regions, of the nat. order Rhamnaceæ; the buckthorns. The berries of the common buckthorn (R. catharticus), a British species, possess purgative properties. The juice of the unripe berry dyes yellow. The berries of several species form articles of commerce from the Mediterranean, under the name of French, Turkey, and Persia berries, grains d'Avignon, &c.

Rhamphastos (ram-fas'tos). See RAMPHASTOS.

Rhaphe (rā'fē), n. In bot. same as Raphe.

Rhaphides. See RAPHIDES.

Rhapsode (rap'sōd), n. A rhapsodist. Grote.
Rhapsodic, Rhapsodical (rap-sōd'ik, rap-sōd'ik-al), a. Pertaining to or consisting of rhapsody; confused and unconnected.

They [Frynne's works] . . . by the generality of scholars are looked upon to be rather rhapsodical and confused, than any way polite or concise.

Wood.

Rhapsodically (rap-sōd'ik-al-li), adv. In the manner of rhapsody.

Rhapsodist (rap'sōd-ist), n. 1. Originally, among the ancient Greeks, one who composed, recited, or sang rhapsodies; especially, one whose profession was to recite or sing the verses of Homer and other poets.

While the latter (the poet) sang, solely or chiefly, his own compositions to the accompaniment of his lyre; the rhapsodist rehearsed the poems of others.

W. Mur.

2. One who recites or sings verses for a livelihood; one who makes and recites verses extempore.

The same populace sit for hours listening to rhapsodists who recite Ariosto.

Carlyle.

3. One who writes or speaks in a confused and disconnected manner with strong excitement or affectation of enthusiasm or feeling; the utterer of a rhapsody.

Ask our rhapsodist, if you have nothing but the excellence and loveliness of virtue to preach, and no future rewards and punishments, how many vicious wretches will you ever reclaim?

Watts.

Rhapsodize (rap'sō-dīz), v. i. pret. & pp. rhapsodized; ppr. rhapsodizing. To recite rhapsodies; to act as a rhapsodist. Athenæum.

Rhapsodize (rap'sō-dīz), v. t. To sing or recite as a rhapsody; to repeat or rehearse in the manner of a rhapsody.

We may form a probable judgment that the Thebais and the Epigoni were then rhapsodized at Sicyon as Homeric productions.

Grote.

Rhapsodomancy (rap-sō'dō-man-sī), n. [Gr. rhapsōdia, rhapsody, and mantia, divination.] Divination by means of verses.

There were various methods of practising this rhapsodomancy. Sometimes they wrote several verses or sentences of a poet on so many pieces of wood, paper, or the like; threw them together in an urn, and drew out one.

Sometimes they cast dice on a table on which verses were written; and that on which the dice lodged contained the prediction. A third manner was by opening a book, and pitching on some verse at first sight. This method they afterwards called the Sortes Frænestine, and afterwards, according to the poet thus made use of, Sortes Homerice, Sortes Virgiliane, &c.

Rees.

Rhapsody (rap'sō-dī), n. [Gr. rhapsōdia—rhapto, rhapso, to sew, and ōdē, a song.] 1. Originally, a short epic poem, or portion of a longer epic such as would be recited by a rhapsodist at one time.

Rhapsody, originally applied to the portions of the poem habitually allotted to different performers in the order of recital, afterwards transferred to the twenty-four books into which each work (the Iliad and the Odyssey) was permanently divided by the Alexandrian grammarians.

W. Mur.

2. An outburst of extravagant sentiment; excessively enthusiastic utterance of admiration, praise, or blame, especially the former. 'Rant and rhapsody.' Couper.—3. A disjointed and confused series of sentences or statements such as would be produced under excitement; rambling composition; jumble. 'A rhapsody of words.' Shak.

He that makes no reflections on what he reads only loads his mind with a rhapsody of tales fit for the entertainment of others.

Locke.

Rhatany (rat'a-nī). See RATANY.

Rhea (rē'a), n. 1. In anc. myth. the daughter of Uranos and Ge, wife and sister of Cronos, and mother of Zeus (Jupiter), Hestia (Vesta), Demeter (Ceres), Here (Juno), Hades (Pluto), &c.—2. A genus of birds, of which the three-toed ostriches of South America are the representatives. See OSTRICH.

Rhea (rē'a), n. [Indian name.] An East Indian plant and fibre, otherwise known as ramie and China-grass. The plant (Bœhmia nivea) belongs to the nettle family, and has long been cultivated in the East, as it is now in France, Algeria, N. America, &c.

Rheic (rē'ik), a. Of or pertaining to rhubarb. —Rheic acid (C₁₀H₈O₆), the yellow, crystalline, granular matter of rhubarb, procured from the plant by means of ether.

Rhein-berry (rīm-be-ri), n. Buckthorn, a plant belonging to the genus Rhamnus (which see).

Rhematic (rē-mat'ik), n. [Gr. rhēmatikos, from rhēma, a sentence, from rhēō, to speak.] The doctrine of propositions or sentences. Coleridge.

Rhematic (rē-mat'ik), a. [Gr. rhēma, a verb.] Gram. pertaining to a verb; derived from a verb; verbal. Fitzedward Hall.

Rhenish (ren'ish), a. Pertaining to the river Rhine; as, Rhenish wine: sometimes used absolutely for Rhenish wine or Rhine wine. See RHINE WINE.

He poured a flagon of Rhenish on my head once. Shaks.

—Rhenish architecture, the style which Romanesque architecture assumed in the countries bordering upon the Rhine, and which dates from nearly the same period as Lombard architecture. It is round-arched; the earliest churches seem to have been circular, but the circular form was absorbed into the rectangular form in the shape of a western apse. There were also a number of small circular or octagonal towers. The arcaded galleries at the eaves, and the richly carved capitals are among the most beautiful features of the style. From the use of the round arch and solid walls, the exteriors are free from the great mass of buttresses used in Gothic buildings.

Rheochord (rê'ô-kord), n. [Gr. rhêô, to flow, and chordê, a chord.] A metallic wire used in measuring the resistance, or varying the strength of an electric current, in proportion to the greater or less length of it inserted in the circuit.

Rheometer (rê-om'et-ér), n. [Gr. rhêô, to flow, and metron, measure.] Another name for the electrometer or galvanometer.

Rheometric (rê-ô-met'rik), a. Pertaining to a rheometer or its use.

Rheometry (rê-om'et-ri), n. [Gr. rhêô, to flow, and metron, measure.] 1. In math. the differential and integral calculus; fluxions.—2. In physics, the method of measuring the velocity and force of electric, &c., currents.

Rheomotor (rê'ô-mô-tér), n. [Gr. rhêô, to flow, and L. motor, a mover.] Any apparatus, as an electrical or galvanic battery, by which an electric or galvanic current is originated.

Rheophore (rê'ô-fôr), n. [Gr. rhêô, to flow, and phorêô, from phêrô, to bear.] Ampère's name for the connecting wire of a voltaic apparatus, as being the transmitter of the current.

Rheoscope (rê'ô-skôp), n. [Gr. rhêô, to flow, and skôpêô, to view.] An instrument by which the existence of an electric, galvanic, or magnetic current may be ascertained.

Rheostat (rê'ô-stat), n. [Gr. rhêô, to flow, and statos, that stands still.] In electromagnetism, an instrument for regulating or adjusting a circuit so that any required degree of force may be maintained. Wheatstone.

Rheotome (rê'ô-tôm), n. [Gr. rhêô, to flow, and tomos, a cutting, from temno, to cut.] An instrument for periodically interrupting an electric current. Faraday.

Rheotrope (rê'ô-trôp), n. [Gr. rhêô, to flow, and tropos, a turn, from trepô, to turn.] An instrument for periodically changing the direction of an electric current. Faraday.

Rhesus (rê'sus), n. The name of a genus of monkeys, including the bruh or pig-tailed monkey (R. nemestrinus), inhabiting the Malay Peninsula and the islands of the Indian Archipelago. It is often domesticated. The name rhesus monkey is also given to the Macacus Rhesus, a species of Indian monkey, held in great veneration by the natives, and of which large numbers swarm about the temples. It is partially migratory, visiting in summer districts of the Himalayas which are much too cold for it in winter.

Rhetian (rê'shi-an), a. Same as Rhetian.

Rhetor (rê'tor), n. [L., from Gr. rhêtôr, an orator or speaker.] A rhetorician.

Your hearing, what is it but as of a rhetor at a desk, to commend or dislike? Hammond.

Rhetoric (rê'tor-ik), n. [Fr. rhetorique, L. rhetorica, from Gr. hê rhêtorikê (technê, art, understood), from rhêtôr, a public speaker, from rhêô, to say, to speak.] 1. The art or branch of knowledge which treats of the rules or principles underlying all effective composition whether in prose or verse; or, as defined by Campbell, the art of discourse, by discourse being understood all discourse or composition spoken or written. Three kinds of discourse are recognized in rhetoric: (1) representative discourse, the object of which is to convey information, the matter being of more importance than the form; under this head are treated such topics as description, narration, and exposition; (2) poetry, in which the matter and purpose are subordinate to the form; (3) oratory, which proposes an end to be attained, to which matter and form are more or less subservient.—2. The art which teaches oratory; the rules that govern the art of speaking with propriety, elegance, and force, or that regulate argumentative prose composition. See extract.

Of rhetoric various definitions have been given by various writers. . . . It is evident that, in its primary signification, rhetoric had reference to public speaking alone, as its etymology implies. But as most of the rules for speaking are of course applicable equally to writing, an extension of the term naturally took place. . . . I propose . . . to treat of 'argumentative composition' generally and exclusively; considering rhetoric (in conformity with the very just and philosophical view of Aristotle) as an offshoot from logic. Abb. Whately.

3. Rhetoric exhibited in language; eloquence, especially artificial eloquence, as opposed to that which is natural and real; flashy oratory; declamation.

Women are better qualified to succeed in oratory than men. It is certain, too, that they are possessed of some springs of rhetoric which men want, such as tears, fainting fits, and the like, which I have seen employed upon occasion, with good success. Spectator.

4. The power of persuasion or influencing; as, the rhetoric of the heart or eyes. 'Sweet silent rhetoric of persuading eyes.' Daniel.

—Rhetoric, Oratory. The former designates the principles or science of oratory; the latter the practice. A man may be thoroughly skilled in the rules of rhetoric and yet be no orator, and vice versa.

Rhetorical (re-tor'ik-al), a. Pertaining to, containing, or involving rhetoric; oratorical; as, the rhetorical art; a rhetorical treatise; a rhetorical flourish.

They permit him to leave their poetical taste ungratified, provided that he gratifies their rhetorical sense and their curiosity. Matt. Arnold.

Rhetorically (re-tor'ik-al-li), adv. In a rhetorical manner; according to the rules of rhetoric; as, to treat a subject rhetorically; a discourse rhetorically delivered.

Rhetoricate (re-tor'ik-ât), v. i. To play the orator.

A person ready to sink under his wants has neither time nor heart to rhetoricate, or make flourishes. South.

Rhetorication (re-tor'ik-â'shon), n. Rhetorical amplification. 'Their rhetorications and equivocal expressions.' Waterland.

Rhetorician (re-tor'ik-shan), n. [Fr. rhetoricien. See RHETORIC.] 1. One who teaches the art of rhetoric, or the principles and rules of correct and elegant speaking and writing; one who teaches oratory.

The ancient sophists and rhetoricians, who had young auditors, lived till they were a hundred years old. Bacon.

2. One well versed in the rules and principles of rhetoric.

The 'understanding' is that by which a man becomes a mere logician, and a mere rhetorician. F. W. Robertson.

3. A public speaker; especially, one who speaks for show; a declaimer.

Or played at Lyons a declaiming prize, At which the vanquish'd rhetorician dies. Dryden.

Rhetorician (re-tor'ik-shan), a. Suited a master of rhetoric. 'Rhetorician pride.' Sir R. Blackmore.

Rhetorize (rê'tor-iz), v. i. To play the orator. Cotgrave.

Rhetorize (rê'tor-iz), v. t. To represent by a figure of oratory; to introduce by a rhetorical device. Milton.

Rheum (rûm), n. [Gr. rheuma, from rhêô, to flow.] 1. An increased action of the excretory vessels of any organ; but generally applied to the increased action of mucous glands, attended with increased discharge and an altered state of their excreted fluids.

I have a rheum in mine eyes too. Shaks.

2. A thin serous fluid, secreted by the mucous glands, &c., as in catarrh; humid matter which collects in the eyes, nose, or mouth, as tears, saliva, and the like. 'You that did void your rheum upon my beard.' Shaks.

Rheum (rê'um), n. [From Gr. rhêôn, the plant rhubarb. See RHUBARB.] A genus of plants of the nat. order Polygonaceæ, including the different species of plants which yield the stalks and root so well known by the name of rhubarb (which see).

Rheuma (rû'ma), n. [Gr. rheuma.] Rheum (which see).

Rheumatic, Rheumatical (rû-mat'ik, rû-mat'ik-al), a. [L. rheumaticus; Gr. rheumatikos, from rheuma, rheum (which see).] Pertaining to rheumatism or partaking of its nature; affected with rheumatism; as, rheumatic pains or affections.

Therefore the moon, the governess of floods, Pale in her anger, washes all the air, That rheumatic diseases do abound. Shaks.

Rheumatism (rû'ma-tizm), n. [L. rheumatismus; Gr. rheumatismos, from rheuma, a watery humour, from rhêô, to flow, the ancients supposing the disease to proceed from a defluxion of humours.] A painful inflammation affecting muscles and joints of the human body, chiefly the larger joints, as the hips, knees, shoulders, &c., attended by swelling and stiffness. It is occasionally accompanied by fever, when it constitutes acute rheumatism or rheumatic fever, which frequently lapses gradually into chronic rheumatism. There are several varieties of chronic rheumatism, as articular rheumatism, which occurs in the joints and muscles of the extremities; lumbago, which occurs in the loins; sciatica, occurring in the hip-joint; &c.

Rheumatismal (rû'ma-tiz'mal), a. Rheumatic.

Rheumatism-root (rû'ma-tizm-rôt), n. See TWIN-LEAF.

Rheumatize (rû'ma-tiz), n. Rheumatism. [Provincial English or Scotch.]

I did feel a rheumatize in my backspaul yestreen. Sir W. Scott.

Rheumy (rûm'i), a. 1. Full of rheum or watery matter; consisting of rheum or partaking of its nature.

His head and rheumy eyes distill in showers. Dryden.

2. Affected with rheum.—3. Causing rheum or rheumatism.

And tempt the rheumy and unpurged air To add unto his sickness. Shaks.

Rhexia (rek'si-a), n. [Gr. rhêxis, rupture, from some species having been formerly used in the cure of rupture. A small genus of Melastomaceæ, commonly called deer-grass or meadow-beauty. The species are low perennial, often bristly, herbs, and have sessile, three to five nerved, bristle-edged leaves, and large, showy, cymose flowers.

Rhigolene (rig'ô-lên), n. [Gr. rhigos, cold, and L. oleum, oil.] A light coal-oil, of low boiling-point, used in surgical operations to render the skin insensible to pain.

Rhime (rîm). See RHYME.

Rhinacanthus (ri-na-kan'thus), n. [Gr. rhîs, rhinos, a snout, and akanthos, a prickly plant, from akantha, a prickle, a spine.] A genus of Indian plants, nat. order Acanthaceæ. R. communis is a native of India. The roots are used by the natives to cure ringworm, and, boiled in milk, are reckoned an aphrodisiac. They resemble Justicia in habit, and have small white flowers in terminal spikes.

Rhinal (rî'nal), a. [Gr. rhîs, rhinos, the nose.] Pertaining to the nose.

Rhinanthaceæ (ri-nan-thâ'sê-ê), n. pl. An order of dicotyledons established by Jussieu, but now incorporated with Scrophulariaceæ.

Rhinanthus (ri-nan'thus), n. [Gr. rhîs, rhinos, a snout, and anthos, a flower, in allusion to the appearance of the corolla.] A genus of annual, probably parasitic, herbs, with opposite serrate leaves, and nodding spikes of yellow flowers, nat. order Scrophulariaceæ. They are natives of Europe, Northern Asia, and North America. Two of them are British, and are known by the name of yellow-rattle.

Rhind-mart (rînd'märt), n. In Scots law, a word of occasional occurrence in the reddendo of charters in the north of Scotland to signify any species of horned cattle given at Martinmas as part of the rent or feu-duty. Bell.

Rhine (rîn), n. [A Sax. ryne, a water-course; comp. runnel, and G. rinne, a channel.] A water-course or ditch. [Provincial.]

Sedgemoor . . . was intersected by many deep and wide trenches which, in that country, are called rhines. Macaulay.

Rhinencephalic (rîn-en-sê-fal'ik), n. [Gr. rhîs, rhinos, the nose, and encephalos, the brain.] Pertaining to the nose and brain; specifically, applied to the prolongation of the substance of the brain forming the olfactory nerves.

Rhinencephalon (rîn-en-sê-fa-lon), n. [See above.] In compar. anat. the anterior division of the brain, in front of the prosencephalon or cerebral hemispheres. From this are given off nerves to the olfactory organs.

Rhine Wine (rîn win), n. A general term for wines produced on the Rhine, but more specifically for those of the Rheingau, a district along the Rhine in the south-west of Nassau, and formerly belonging to the archbishopric of Mayence. Among the best known and most valuable of the white Rhine wines are Johannisberg, Hochheimer, Rudesheimer, Steinberger, Rothenberger, and Markobrunner. The red wines are not so much esteemed. Of these Asmannhäuser is the most celebrated. The wines produced below Düsseldorf are of inferior quality.

Rhino (rī'nō), n. A cant word for gold and silver or money.

A famous wedding we had of it as long as the rhino lasted. Marryatt.

Rhinobatidæ (rī-nō-bat'i-dē), n. pl. [Gr. rhīs, rhinos, the nose, and batis, a ray.] The shark-rays or beaked rays, a family of plagiostomous elasmobranchiate fishes, uniting the character of the sharks and the rays, but referred to the latter in virtue of the position of the gill-openings and the nature of the teeth. The muzzle is generally beaked and pointed, the mouth undulated, and the teeth rounded or elliptical (in some broader than long), the body being smooth. The saw-fish is the most remarkable member of the family. See SAW-FISH.

Rhinocerial, Rhinocercal (rī-nō-sē'ri-al, rī-nō-sē'rik-al), a. Pertaining to the rhinoceros; resembling the rhinoceros; turning up like the horn on the snout of a rhinoceros: humorously applied in the Tattler to a turned-up nose.

Rhinoceros (rī-nos'e-ros), n. [L. rhinoceros; Gr. rhīnokēros, nose-horn—rhīs, rhinos, the nose, and keras, a horn.] A genus of perissodactylate ungulates or hoofed mammals, co-extensive with the family Rhinocerotidæ, and nearly allied to the elephant, the hippopotamus, the tapir, &c. They are large ungainly animals, having a very thick skin, which is usually thrown into deep folds. The muzzle is rounded and blunt, and there are seven molars on each side of each jaw; there are no canines, but there are usually incisor teeth in both jaws. The skull is pyramidal, and the nasal bones are enormously developed. The feet are furnished with three toes each, encased in hoofs. The nasal bones usually support one or two horns, which are composed of longitudinal fibres agglutinated together, and are of the nature of epidermic growths, somewhat analogous to hairs. When two horns are present the hinder one rests on the frontal bones, and is placed on the middle line of the head behind the anterior horn. The posterior horn is generally shorter than the anterior, and always differs from it in shape. They live in marshy places, and subsist chiefly on grasses and the foliage of trees. They are at the present time exclusively confined to the warmer parts of the eastern hemisphere, but several extinct species ranged over the greater part of Europe, their remains having been discovered in the miocene and subsequent tertiary strata of that continent. One extinct species, R. tichorhinus, or woolly rhinoceros, formerly inhabited family of insectivorous Cheiroptera, including the greater and lesser horseshoe-bats of this country. The species of this family have the nose furnished with a crested membrane, which is sometimes very complicated, and has more or less the appearance of a horse-shoe. These appendages are highly sensitive, and most likely prove of great service in directing the members of the group in their flight.

Rhinoplastic (rī-nō-plas'tik), a. [Gr. rhīs, rhinos, the nose, and plassō, to form.] Forming a nose.—Rhinoplastic operation, a surgical operation for forming an artificial nose, or restoring a nose partly lost: sometimes called the Talacottian Operation, from Talacottius, an Italian surgeon who first performed it. It generally consists in bringing down a triangular portion of skin from the forehead, twisting it round, and causing it to adhere by its under surface and edges to the part of the nose remaining. The skin may also be taken from another part of the body. The extreme joint of one of the fingers has been used in supporting such an artificial nose.

Rhinoplasty (rī'nō-plas'ti), n. Same as Rhinoplastic Operation. See RHINOPLASTIC.

Rhinoscope (rī'nō-skōp), n. [Gr. rhīs, rhinos, the nose, and skōpō, to view.] A small mirror for inspecting the passages of the nose.

Rhinoscopic (rī-nō-skōp'ik), a. Of or pertaining to the rhinoscope.

Rhinoscopy (rī-nōs'ko-pi), n. Inspection of the nasal passages by means of the rhinoscope.

Rhipiptera (rī-pi'p'ter-a), n. pl. [Gr. rhipis, a fan, and pteron, a wing.] Fan-winged insects, an order of insects which have only one pair of wings fully developed, and these on the metathorax. This is Latreille's name for the order of insects designated by Kirby Strepsiptera, and which includes the two genera Xenos and Stylops. See STREPSIPTERA.

Rhipsalis (rī'pa-s'lis), n. A genus of Cactaceæ consisting of a considerable number of small fleshy, jointed-branched, leafless plants, usually growing upon trees, varying considerably in general appearance, and inhabiting South and Central America, Mexico, and the West Indies.

Rhizanth (rī'zanth), n. A plant belonging to the Rhizanthææ.

Rhizanthææ (rī-zan'th'ē-ē), n. pl. [Gr. rhiza, a root, and anthos, a flower.] One of the five classes into which Lindley divided the vegetable kingdom. It consists of plants destitute of true leaves, but with short amorphous stems parasitical on roots, and includes the orders Cythaceæ, Rafflesiaceæ, and Balanophoraceæ. By other botanists these orders are placed widely apart.

Rhizobolaceæ (rī-zō'bō-lā'sē-ē), n. pl. [From Rhizobolus, the principal genus.] A small family of tropical American dicotyledonous trees, comprising only the genera Caryocar or Rhizobolus and Anthodiscus. The saouari or souari nuts of the shops, one of the most delicious seeds of the nut kind, are the produce of Caryocar nuciforme and butyrosam, and the latter tree yields excellent timber. They are now referred to Ternstroemiaceæ.

Rhizocarpus (rī-zō-kār'pus), a. [Gr. rhiza, a root, and karpus, fruit.] In bot. a term applied to those plants whose roots endure many years, but whose stems perish annually, as herbaceous plants.

Rhizocephala (rī-zō-sēf'a-la), n. pl. [Gr. rhiza, a root, and kephalē, the head.] A name proposed for a group of low crustacea, of the sub-class Epizoa, but nearly allied to the cirripedes or barnacles. They are fixed, and are commonly found parasitic on crabs, and are greatly deformed when adult, but active and free-swimming when young.

Rhizocrinus (rī-zō-kri'nus), n. A genus of crinoids or lily-stems represented by the R. Loffotensis of Sars. Rhizocrinus is nearly allied to the fossil Apicrinidæ of the chalk.

Rhizodont (rī-zō-dont), n. [Gr. rhiza, a root, and odontos, a tooth.] A term applied to reptiles whose teeth, like those of the crocodiles, are planted in sockets.

Head of Rhinotophus unifer.

Rhizodus (rī-zō-dus), n. A genus of fossil ganoid fishes, allied to reptiles, occurring in the coal-measures, originally confounded with Holoptychius, but differing from the latter in the large size of the species, the form of the scales, and in the teeth.

Rhizogen (rī-zō-gen), n. [Gr. rhiza, a root, and gennaō, to produce.] A parasitic plant growing on the roots of others. Rhizogens constitute the third class in Dr. Lindley's system.

Rhizoid, Rhizoideous (rī-zoid, rī-zoi'dē-us), a. [Gr. rhiza, a root, and eidos, likeness.] In bot. resembling a root.

Rhizoma (rī-zō'ma), n. Same as Rhizome.

Rhizomania (rī-zō-mā'nī-a), n. [Gr. rhiza, a root, and mania, madness.] In bot. an abnormal development of roots peculiar to many plants, as ivy, screw-pines, figs, &c., which send out roots from various parts, just as trees produce adventitious buds. In some plants rhizomania is an indication that there is something wrong with the true root, in consequence of which it cannot supply sufficient food to the plant. In such cases rhizomania is an effort of nature to supply the deficiency. This is the case in vines and common laurel. In the latter plant rhizomania generally forebodes death. The phenomenon is also frequently seen in apple trees, from the stems of which bundles of roots are sent out. These catching moisture and finally decaying are a cause of canker on the tree.

Rhizome (rī-zōm or rīz'om), n. [Gr. rhizōma, a rooted state, from rhizōō, to plant, from rhiza, a root.] In bot. a sort of stem running along the surface of the ground, or partially subterranean, sending forth shoots at its upper end and decaying at the other. It occurs in the ferns, iris, &c. In the ferns it may be wholly covered with the soil. Called also Rootstock.

Rhizomorpha (rī-zō-mor'fa), n. [Gr. rhiza, a root, and morphē, shape.] The name given to what was formerly supposed to be a genus of Fungi, but in reality comprising a great number of root-like productions which are simply particular states of Polypori, Hypoxyla, &c., many of which owe their peculiar flatness to their growing between the wood and bark of forest trees, and being thus strongly compressed. Other matters, as roots of willows, elms, and herbaceous plants filling up drain-tiles or other cavities, have been referred to this genus. Fries believes that one true species, R. subterranea, is produced in mines, to which, from its phosphorescence, it gives a luminous appearance. In the coal-mines near Dresden this species is described as giving those places the appearance of an enchanted castle; the roof, walls, and pillars are entirely covered with it, its beautiful light almost dazzling the eye. The light is found to increase with the temperature of the mines.

Rhizomorphoid, Rhizomorphous (rī-zō-mor'foid, rī-zō-mor'fus), a. [Gr. rhiza, a root, morphē, shape, and eidos, likeness.] Rootlike in form.

Rhizomys (rī-zō-mis), n. [Gr. rhiza, a root, and mys, a mouse.] A genus of rodents remarkable for their very small eyes and ears. A good example of this genus is the bay bamboo rat (R. badius), which inhabits Malacca and China. It is about as large as a rabbit, and is very hurtful to the bamboo, on the root of which it feeds. The front of the incisor teeth is bright red.

Rhizophaga (rī-zōf'a-ga), n. pl. [Gr. rhiza, a root, and phagō, to eat.] Root-eaters; one of the five sections into which Owen divides the marsupials, of which the most characteristic species is the Australian wombat. See WOMBAT.

Rhizophagous (rī-zōf'a-gus), a. [Gr. rhiza, a root, and phagō, to eat.] Feeding on roots.

Rhizophora (rī-zōf'ō-ra), n. [Gr. rhiza, a root, and phērō, to bear.] A genus of trees which gives its name to the nat. order Rhizophoraceæ. The species are known by the name of mangrove (See MANGROVE); they are remarkable for their seeds germinating Rhizome or Rootstock of Iris.

Indian Rhinoceros (Rhinoceros indicus).

England. Of the existing one-horned species the best known is the Indian rhinoceros (R. indicus). It grows to the height of 5 feet; the horn is seldom very long. It inhabits Bengal and a considerable portion of Asia. Of the two-horned species a well-known example is the African rhinoceros (R. bicornis), which occurs in Cape Colony and in the southern parts of the African continent.—Rhinoceros hornbill, a name given to a variety of hornbill. Also called Rhinoceros-bird. See HORNBILL.

Rhinoceros-bird (rī-nos'e-ros-bērd), n. A bird of the genus Buceros (B. rhinoceros), a species of hornbill. See HORNBILL.

Rhinocerotidæ, Rhinocerotidæ (rī-nos'e-rot'i-dē, rī-nō-sē'ri-dē), n. pl. A family of ungulate mammals, comprising the various species of rhinoceros. See RHINOCEROS.

Rhinolophidæ (rī-nō-lof'i-dē), n. pl. [Gr. rhīs, rhinos, the nose, and lophos, a crest.] A fa-even while attached to the branches, and also for the numerous adventitious root-like projections which serve as supports for the stem. The wood of several species is hard and durable, and the bark astringent. The bark of R. gymnorhiza is used in India for dyeing black. The species are natives of the tropics, where they root in the mud, and form a dense thicket down to the verge of the water.

Mangrove (Rhizophora mangle).

Rhizophoraceæ (ri-zōf'ō-rā'sē-ē), n. pl. The mangroves; a natural order of trees of which the genus Rhizophora is the type. See RHIZOPHORA.

Rhizophorus (ri-zōf'ō-rus), a. In bot. root-bearing; belonging to the natural order Rhizophoraceæ.

Rhizopod (ri-zō-pod), n. A member of the order Rhizopoda.

Rhizopoda (ri-zōp'o-da), n. pl. [Gr. rhiza, a root, and pous, podos, a foot.] The lowest class of the Protozoa, comprehending those members which are destitute of a mouth, are single or compound, and possess the power of emitting pseudopodia. They are mostly minute, frequently microscopic, but some (such as the sponges) attain considerable size. Structurally the rhizopods consist of a mass of sarcode, destitute of organs for digestion, &c. The characteristic from which they have their name is their capability of protruding processes (pseudopodia) from any part of their substance, sometimes as filaments or threads and sometimes finger-shaped, and retracting them at pleasure. The Amoeba (which see) may be regarded as a typical rhizopod. Some, as the Foraminifera, are invested with a calcareous shell, sometimes consisting of one cell, but generally of an aggregation of minute chambers or cells, through the pores of which they protrude their fibre-like processes. The class has been divided into five orders—Monera, Amœbea, Foraminifera, Radiolaria, and Spongia, of which the last is occasionally considered a separate class. See separate entries.

Rhizostoma (ri-zos'to-ma), n. [Gr. rhiza, a root, and stoma, a mouth.] A genus of coelenterate animals belonging to the order Lucernaria. These animals resemble huge jelly-fishes, and may attain a diameter of 3 feet or more. They are chiefly met with in tropical seas, and possess powerful stinging cells. R. Cuvieri is a familiar species. The Rhizostomæ have their sense-organs covered by a 'hood,' and hence are 'hidden-eyed' Medusæ.

Rhizostome (ri-zō-stōm), n. A hydrozoan of the section Discophora and order Lucernaria.

Rhizostomidæ (ri-zō-stom'id-ē), n. pl. [Gr. rhiza, a root, and stoma, a mouth.] A family of Hydrozoa of the order Lucernaria, in which reproductive elements are developed in free zooids, produced by fission; the umbrella or disc of the generative zooids is without marginal tentacles, and the polypites are numerous, modified, and depending on a dendriform or tree-shaped mass from the umbrella. The genus Rhizostoma is the type. See RHIZOSTOMA.

Rhizotaxis (ri-zō-tak'sis), n. [Gr. rhiza, a root, and taxis, arrangement.] In bot. the arrangement of the roots.

Rhodaloze, Rhodalose (rō'dal-ōz, rō'dal-ōs), n. [Gr. rhodon, a rose, and halo, halos, salt.] Red or cobalt vitriol; sulphate of cobalt.

Rhodanic (rō-dan'ik), a. [Gr. rhodon, a rose.] A term applied to an acid, called also Sulphocyanic Acid, which produces a red colour with persalts of iron.

Rhodanthe (rō-dan'thē), n. [Gr. rhodon, a rose, and anthos, a flower.] A beautiful genus of Compositæ found in Western Australia. The only species is R. Manglessii, of which there are several varieties, differing from each other mainly in the size and colour of the flower-heads, which have the dry character of what are commonly called 'everlastings.' It is an annual, rising from 1 to 1½ foot high, with an erect branching stem, oblong blunt entire stem-clasping leaves of a glaucous green colour, and flower-heads, varying from pale rose to deep purple, supported on stalks arranged in a corymbose manner.

Rhodes-wood (rōdz'wyd), n. The wood of the West Indian tree Amyris balsamifera. Called also Candlewood.

Rhodian (rō'di-an), a. Pertaining to Rhodes, an isle of the Mediterranean; as, Rhodian laws, the earliest system of marine law known to history, said to be compiled by the Rhodians after they had by their commerce and naval victories obtained the sovereignty of the sea, about 900 B.C.

Rhodian (rō'di-an), n. A native or inhabitant of Rhodes.

Rhodio-chloride (rō'di-ō-klō-rīd), n. In chem. a double chloride of rhodium and the alkali metals.

Rhodiola (rō-di-ō-la), n. A genus of alpine plants belonging to the nat. order Crassulaceæ. The R. rosea, now frequently called Sedum Rhodiola or rose-root, is a British plant found on cliffs along the sea and on high mountains. It is very common in the Highlands of Scotland and the Hebrides. The root, which is thick and fleshy, smells like a rose. The leaves are glaucous, sessile, and alternate, and the yellow or purplish flowers are in compact corymbose cymes. It is found throughout Western Europe, including the Arctic regions, the Himalayas, and east and west North America.

Rhodium (rō'di-um), n. [Gr. rhodon, a rose, on account of the red colour of some of its salts, especially of the chloride, when dissolved in water.] Syn. Rh.; at. wt. 104.2. A metal discovered in the beginning of the present century by Wollaston, associated with palladium in the ore of platinum. Rhodium is very infusible, scarcely softening in the flame of the oxyhydrogen blow-pipe. When fused it has a white colour and a metallic lustre. It is grayish-white in colour, extremely hard, brittle, and has a sp. gr. of 12.1. It unites with oxygen at a red heat, a mixture of peroxide and protoxide being formed. When pure it is not acted upon by any acid, but if in the state of an alloy it is dissolved by aqua regia. It has been used for the points of metallic pens.

Rhodocrinite (rō-dok'ri-nit), n. [See RHODOCRINUS.] In palæon. a rose-encrinite.

Rhodocrinus (rō-dō-krī'aus), n. [Gr. rhodon, a rose, and krinos, a lily.] A genus of palæozoic encrinites with a round and sometimes slightly pentagonal column, formed of numerous joints, and perforated by a pentagonal alimentary canal; the rose-encrinites.

Rhododendron (rō-dō-den'dron), n. [Gr. rhododendron, an oleander or a rhododendron, lit. rose-tree—rhodon, a rose, and dendron, a tree.] A genus of highly-prized evergreen shrubs very common in gardens, belonging to the nat. order Ericaceæ. The species have alternate, entire, evergreen leaves, and ornamental flowers disposed in corymbs. They are nearly related to each other, and occur both in the New and Old Worlds. The varieties cultivated in this country belong chiefly to R. ponticum, a native of the coasts of the Black Sea, or to R. cataractense, an American species, or to hybrids between these two. The leaves of R. chrysanthum, a Siberian species with yellow flowers, possess narcotic properties, and have a great reputation as a remedy for chronic rheumatism. Some of the most ornamental species are natives of the Himalayas. R. ferrugineum, found wild in Switzerland, is called the rose of the Alps.

Rhododendron chrysanthum.

Rhodomelaceæ (rō'dō-mē-lā'sē-ē), n. pl. [Gr. rhodon, a rose, and mélon, an apple, a fruit.] An order of floriferous or rhodosperean algae, consisting of red or brown sea-weeds, with a leafy or filiform, areolated or articulated frond composed of polygonal cells. There are several British species.

Rhodomontade (rōd'ō-mon-tād), n. Erroneous spelling of Rodomontade.

Rhodonite (rō'don-īt), n. [Gr. rhodon, a rose.] A mineral consisting chiefly of manganese silicate, mixed with silicates of iron, calcium, &c.

Rhodospereæ (rō-dō-spēr'mē-ē), n. pl. [Gr. rhodon, a rose, and sperma, seed.] One of the three divisions into which Algae have been divided, the two others being the Melanospereæ and Chlorospereæ. The species, with one or two exceptions, are marine, and are distinguished for their brilliant permanent tints of a rosy-red or purple colour, leaf-like fronds, and the collection of their spores into sort, or if scattered, by the spores being arranged on a ternary plan. This division comprises the orders Rhodomelaceæ, Laurenciaceæ, Corallinaceæ, Delesseriaceæ, Rhodymeniaceæ, Cryptonemiaceæ, and Ceramiciæ. Called also Floreadæ.

Rhodosporeæ (rō-dō-spōr'ē-ē), n. pl. Same as Rhodospereæ.

Rhodostauritic (rō'dō-stā-rot'ik), a. [Gr. rhodon, a rose, and stauris, a cross.] Rosicrucian. B. Jonson.

Rhodymenia (rō-di-mē'ni-a), n. [Gr. rhodon, a rose, and hymen, a membrane.] The typical genus of the nat. order of rose-spored algae Rhodymeniaceæ. R. palmata is the well-known dulse of our sea-coasts.

Rhodymeniaceæ (rō-di-mē'ni-ā'sē-ē), n. pl. An order of Floridan sea-weeds of purplish or blood-red colour. The root is disc-like or branched, much matted; the frond, which is composed of polygonal cells, is either leafy or filiform, and much branched, never articulate. The species are widely dispersed.

Rhodymenia palmata, or dulse, is a well-known example. Many of the species of the genus Gracilaria are largely used in the East as ingredients in soups, jellies, &c., and as substitutes for glue. One of them is the agar-agar of the Chinese.

Rhomb (rom), n. [Fr. rhombe, L. rhombus, from Gr. rhombos.] 1. In geom. a rhombus, an oblique-angled equilateral parallelogram, or a quadrilateral figure whose sides are equal, and the opposite sides parallel, but the angles unequal, two of the angles being obtuse and two acute.—2. In crystal, a solid bounded by six equal and similar rhombic planes; a rhombohedron.—Fresnel's rhomb, a rhomb of crown-glass, so cut that a ray of light entering one of its faces at right angles shall emerge at right angles at the opposite face, after undergoing within the rhomb, at its other faces, two total reflections. It is used to produce a ray circularly polarized, which again becomes plain-polarized on being transmitted through a second Fresnel's rhomb.

Rhombic (rom'bik), a. Having the figure of a rhomb.

Rhombohedral (rom-bō-hē'dral), a. [See RHOMBOHEDRON.] 1. In geom. relating to a rhombohedron; having forms derived from the rhombohedron.—2. In crystal, relating to a system of forms known by the presence of four axes, three of which are in the same plane and inclined to each other at an angle of 60°, whilst the remaining fourth axis is perpendicular to the three, as in the regular six-sided prism and the rhombohedron.

Rhombohedron (rom-bō-hē'dron), n. [Gr. rhombos, a rhomb, and hedra, a side.] In geom. and crystal, a solid bounded by six rhombic planes; a rhomb.

Rhomboid (rom'boid), n. [Gr. rhombos, rhomb, and eidos, form.] 1. In geom. a quadrilateral figure whose opposite sides and angles are equal, but which is neither equilateral nor equiangular.—2. In crystal, a solid having a rhomboidal form with three axes of unequal lengths, two of which are at right angles to each other, whilst the third is so inclined as to be perpendicular to one of the two axes, and oblique to the other.

Rhomboid (rom'boid), a. Rhomboid-shaped; rhomboidal; specifically, (a.) in anat. applied to a thin, broad, and obliquely square fleshy muscle between the basis of the scapula and the spina dorsi. (b.) In bot. applied to a diamond-shaped leaf; called also a rhomboidal leaf.

Rhomboidal (rom-boi'dal), a. Having the shape of a rhomboid, or a shape approaching it.

A rhomb of Iceland-spar, a solid bounded by six equal and similar rhomboidal surfaces. Brewster.

Rhomboides (rom-boi'déz), n. A rhomboid. 'A geometrical rhomboides.' Milton. [Rare.]

Rhomboid-ovate (rom-boid-ô'vât), a. Between rhomboid and oval in shape; partly rhomboid, partly oval.

Rhomb-spar (rom'spâr), n. A mineral of a grayish white, occurring massive, disseminated and crystallized in rhomboids, imbedded in chlorite slate, limestone, &c. It consists chiefly of carbonates of lime and magnesia.

Rhombus (rom'bûs), n. 1. In geom. same as Rhomb.—2. A genus of fishes comprising the turbot, brill, and some others of less importance; so named from their rhomboidal form.

Rhonal (rong'kal), a. Relating or pertaining to rhonchus; as, rhonal fluctuation. Dunglison.

Rhynchonant (rong-kis'o-nant), a. [L. rhonchus, a rattle, a snore, and sonans, sonant, ppr. of sono, to sound.] Snorting. [Rare.]

Rhynchus (rong'kus), n. [L., from Gr. rhonchos, a snoring sound.] In med. the same as Rattle or Rôle; also the deep snoring which accompanies inspiration in some diseases, particularly in apoplexy; stertor.

Rhone (rôn), n. [Scotch.] A rain-water pipe. See ROSE.

Rhoode-bok (rô'de-bok), n. Same as Roodebok.

Rhopalic (rô-pal'ik), a. [Gr. rhopalon, a club which from the handle to the top grows bigger and bigger.] In pros. applied to a line in which each succeeding word contains a syllable more than that preceding it. 'Hope ever solaces miserable individuals' is an example.

Rhopalocera (rô-pa-lôs'êr-a), n. pl. [Gr. rhopalon, a club, and keras, a horn.] That section of lepidopterous insects which comprises the diurnal Lepidoptera, or butterflies, distinguished by the vertical position of the wings during repose (the moths having them horizontal), and by their having the antennæ slender and terminated by a small club (whence the name).

Rhopalodon (rô-pal'ô-don), n. [Gr. rhopalon, a club, and odontos, a tooth.] Lit. club-tooth. The name given to a fossil genus of reptiles from the Permian of Russia, apparently related to the lizards from the Permian of Bristol. The name is from the shape of the teeth, which with some fragments of the jaw constitute all the remains that have been found.

Rhotacismus (rô-ta-siz'mus), n. Same as Rotacism.

Rhubarb (rô'bârb), n. [Fr. rhubarbe, O. Fr. rheubarbare, from L. rheubarbarum, from Gr. rhêon barbaron—rhêon, rhubarb (said to be from Rha, the Volga), and barbaron, barbarian. The plant is indigenous on the banks of the Volga.] The common name of plants of the genus Rheum (see RHEUM), which yield the leaf-stalks used for making tarts, &c. The species, which are numerous, are large herbaceous plants, natives of central Asia, with strong, branching, almost fleshy roots; erect, thick branching stems, sometimes 6 or 8 feet high. The roots are medicinal; but those of different species seem to possess their medicinal properties in very different degrees. The best official rhubarb is the root of R. officinale, a species growing in south-eastern Tibet. A good deal of rhubarb reaches Europe through Russia, but formerly came through Turkey by way of Anatolia, hence its name of Russian or Turkey rhubarb. Other species are Rheum undulatum, or Bucharian rhubarb; R. Rhaponticum, or English rhubarb; R. Rhaponticum undulatum and compactum, or French rhubarb; R. palmatum, and R. Emodi and Webbianum, or Himalayan rhubarb. Rhubarb is a valuable article in the materia medica, being an aperient, and at the same time a tonic and astringent.—Monk's rhubarb, Rumea alpinus and R. Patertia.—Poor man's rhubarb, Thalictrum flavum.

Medicinal Rhubarb (Rheum officinale).

Rhubarby (rô'bârb-i), a. Relating to rhubarb; like rhubarb.

Rhumb (rum), n. [From rhomb.] In navig. (a.) a line which makes any given angle with the meridian. (b.) One of the thirty-two points of the compass. (c.) A rhumb-line.

Rhumb-line (rum'lin), n. In navig. a line described by the course of a ship sailing steadily in any one direction except towards any of the cardinal points; same as Loxodromic Curve. See LOXODROMIC.

Rhus (rus), n. [L., from Gr. rhous, sumach.] Sumach, a genus of deciduous trees and evergreen shrubs, nat. order Anacardiaceæ. This genus is found in the south of Europe, in Africa, in Asia, and North and South America. They have usually compound leaves and panicles of small greenish-white or yellowish flowers. Most of the species are poisonous, but they are much cultivated as ornamental shrubs, on account of the beautiful red colour of their leaves in autumn. Many of them are used also for the purposes of dyeing and tanning, as an astringent principle, to which is frequently added an acid, is common to the whole genus. The juice of R. Toxicodendron (the poison-ivy or poison-oak) is extremely poisonous. R. Coriaria, or elm-leaved sumach, is extensively used for the purpose of tanning. R. vernicefera (the varnish-bearing sumach or Japan varnish-tree) yields a varnish used by the Japanese, and applied to furniture and almost everything made of wood. R. venenata (the poison sumach or swamp sumach), a native of North America, is exceedingly poisonous; so virulent that it is said to affect some persons by merely smelling it.

Rhusma (rus'ma), n. In tanning, a mixture of caustic lime and orpiment or tersulphide of arsenic, used in depilation or unhairing of hides. E. H. Knight.

Rhyme (rim), n. [O. E. ryme, ryme, rym, from A. Sax. rim, gerim, number, rhyme; Icel. rim, computation, rhyme, rima, a rhyme, a ballad; D. rym, Dan. rim, G. reim, rhyme. The Romance forms, Fr. ryme, rim, rima, rhyme, a poem, Sp. and Pg. rima, are no doubt from the Teutonic, and not from L. rhythmus, Gr. rhythmos, rhythm. The latter word has, however, affected the spelling of rhyme, which would be more correctly written ryme, as in Old English and by some modern writers. 'The spelling rhyme or rhyme (with h inserted from ignorance) is not older than A. D. 1550.' Skeat.] 1. A correspondence of sound in the final portions of two or more syllables, more especially the correspondence in sound of the terminating word or syllable of one line of poetry with the terminating word or syllable of another. To constitute this correspondence in single words or in syllables it is necessary that the vowel and the final consonantal sound (if any) should be the same, or have nearly the same sound, the initial consonants being different, as in find and mind, new and drew, cause and laws.—Male or masculine rhymes, rhymes in which only the final syllables agree; as, strain, complain.—Female or feminine rhymes, rhymes in which the two final syllables agree, the first being accented; as, motion, poison.—2. An expression of thought in verse; poetry; metre; also, a composition in verse; a poem, especially a short one. 'Things unattempted yet, in prose or rime,' Milton. 'Read me rhymes elaborately good,' Tennyson. 'When you sang me that sweet rhyme,' Tennyson.

He knew
Himself to sing, and build the lofty rhyme. Milton.

3. A verse or line rhyming with another; as, to string rhymes together.—4. A word answering in sound to another word.

Is thy ambition sweating for a rhyme,
Thou unambitious fool, at this late time? Young.

—Rhyme and reason, verse or metre and sense; reasonable or sensible grounds. Also neither rhyme nor reason, &c. The alliterative collocation of these words is old, and rhyme here often loses its own special signification. But are you so much in love as your rhymes speak? Neither rhyme nor reason can express how much. Shak.

For rhyme with reason may dispense,
And sound has right to govern sense. Prior.

—To act without rhyme or reason, to act recklessly, or without due thought and consideration.

Rhyme (rim), v. i. pret. & pp. rhymed; ppr. rhyming. 1. To accord in the terminational sounds.

But fagotted his notions as they fell,
And if they rhymed and rattled, all was well. Dryden.

2. To make verses.

There march'd the bard and blockhead side by side,
Who rhymed for hire, and patronized for pride. Pope.

Rhyme (rim), v. t. 1. To put into rhyme; as, to rhyme a story.—2. To bring into a certain condition by rhyming; to influence by rhyme. 'Fellows of infinite tongue, that can rhyme themselves into ladies' favours,' Shak.

Rhymeless (rim'les), a. Destitute of rhyme; not having consonance of sound. 'And doth beside on rhymeless numbers tread,' Bp. Hall.

Rhymer (rim'êr), n. One who makes rhymes; a versifier; a poor poet.

Rhymer, come on, and do the worst you can;
I fear not you, nor yet a better man. Dryden.

Rhyme-royal (rim'roi-al), n. A name formerly given to the stanza of seven lines of ten-syllable verse, in which the first and third lines rhyme, the second, fourth, and fifth, and the sixth and seventh. The following stanza from Sackville's Induction to Mirror for Magistrates is an example.

'And first, within the porch and jaws of hell,
Sat dread Remorse of Conscience, all bespent
With tears; and to herself of would she tell
Her wretchedness, and cursing, never stint
To sob and sigh, but ever thus lament
With thoughtful care; as she that, all in vain,
Would wear and waste continually in pain.'

Rhymery (rim'êr-i), n. The art of making rhymes. Eccl. Rev. [Rare.]

Rhymic (rim'ik), a. Pertaining to rhyme. [Rare.]

Rhymster, Rhymist (rim'stêr, rim'ist), n. A rhymist; a poor or mean poet.

Rhynchocephalia (rin'kô-se-fâ'ti-a), n. pl. [Gr. rhynchos, a snout, and kephalê, head.] A group of lizards comprising only the genus Sphenodon (which see).

Rhynchoceti (rin'kô-sê'ti), n. pl. [Gr. rhynchos, a snout, and ketos, a whale.] A family of cetaceans allied to the cachalots or sperm-whales. They are distinguished by the possession of a pointed snout, single blow-hole, small dorsal fin, and dentition. The most important living genera are Hyperoodon and Ziphius, of which the former is found in the North Atlantic, and the latter in the Mediterranean and South Atlantic.

Rhyncholite (rin'kol-it), n. [Gr. rhynchos, a beak, and lithos, a stone.] The fossil mandible of a cephalopod.

Rhynchonella (rin'ko-nel'la), n. [A dim. from Gr. rhynchos, a beak.] Lit. little-beak. A genus of brachiopodous molluscs, characterized by a trigonal, acutely-beaked shell. No fewer than 250 fossil species are numbered from the lower Silurian upward, but only two or three living species are known, inhabiting the deeper parts of the Arctic and Antarctic Oceans.

Rhynchonellidæ (rin-kō-nel'i-dē), n. pl. A family of mollusoids of the class Brachiopoda. The valves of the shell are united along a hinge-line; the lobes of the mantle are not completely free, and the intestine ends caecally.

Rhynchophora (rin-kō-fō-ra), n. [Gr. rhynchos, a snout, and phorō, to bear.] The curculios or weevils, a sub-section of coleopterous insects, characterized by having the head prolonged in the form of a snout or proboscis.

Rhynchophora—Curculio imperialis.

Rhynchophore (rin-kō-fōr), n. One of the Rhynchophora.

Rhynchops (rin-kops), n. [Gr. rhynchos, a beak, and ops, the eye.] The skimmers or scissor-bills, a genus of aquatic birds belonging to the gull family, and allied to the terns. The R. nigra (black skimmer or shearwater) is found on the coasts of America, and on various coasts of Asia. It skims, while on wing, the surface of the sea for its food. Another species is found in Africa, R. orientalis. See SKIMMER.

Rhynchosaurus (rin-kō-sg'rus), n. [Gr. rhynchos, a beak or snout, and sauros, a lizard.] A fossil genus of saurians discovered in the new red sandstone of Warwickshire. There are no teeth apparent in either jaw, and Professor Owen supposes it may have had its jaws encased by a bony or horny sheath as in turtles.

Rhynchospora (rin-kos'po-ra), n. [Gr. rhynchos, a beak, and sporos, seed.] Beak-rush, a genus of perennial tufted leafy sedges, nat. order Cyperaceae. Two species, R. alba and R. fusca, are British plants growing on wet spongy bogs. The former is common, but the latter has been hitherto recognized in only a few places.

Rhyme (rin), n. The name given to the best quality of Russian hemp.

Rhyparography (ri-pa-ro-grā-fī), n. [Gr. rhyparos, foul, filthy, and graphō, to write, to delineate.] Lit. dirt-painting: a contemptuous term applied by the ancients to genre or still-life pictures. Fairholt.

Rhyssimeter (ri-sim'e-tēr), n. [Gr. rhysis, a flowing, and metron, a measure.] An instrument for measuring the velocity of fluids or the speed of ships. It presents the open end of a tube to the impact of the current, which raises a column of mercury in a graduated tube.

Rhythm, Rhythmus (rithm, rith'mus), n. [L. rhythmus, from Gr. rhythmos, any regularly recurring vibratory motion, from root of rheō, to flow.] 1. The measure of time or movement by regularly recurring impulses, sounds, &c., as in poetry, prose composition, and music, and by analogy, dancing; periodical emphasis; numerical proportion or harmony. In poetry it is the regular succession of accent, emphasis, or voice-stress; or a certain succession of long and short (heavy and light) syllables in a verse. Prose also has its rhythm, and the only difference (so far as sound is concerned) between verse and prose is, that the former consists of a regular succession of similar cadences, or of a limited variety of cadences, divided by grammatical pauses and emphases into proportional clauses, so as to present sensible responses to the ear at regular proportioned distances; prose, on the other hand, is an arrangement of words in an expressive and pleasing succession; but it does not follow precise rules of rhythm as in poetry, except, perhaps, it may approximate to the rhythm of verse at the beginning and end of periods. In music, rhythm is the disposition of the notes of a composition in respect of time and measure; the periodical recurrence of accent; the measured beat which marks the character and expression of the music. In dancing, the rhythm is recognized in the sound of the feet.—2. Rhyme; metre; verse; number.

Shutting reasons up in rhythm,
Of Heliconian honey in living words,
To make a truth less harsh. Tennyson.

3. In med. the order of proportion, as regards time, which reigns between the different movements of an organ—as of the organism in health and disease. Thus, rhythm is applied to the diurnal variations of the pulse; and to the paroxysmal movements of an intermittent. Dunglison.

Rhythmer† (rith'mēr), n. A rhymist; a poetaster. 'One now scarce counted for a rhythmer, formerly admitted for a poet.' Fuller.

Rhythmic, Rhythmical (rith'mik, rith'mik-al), a. [Gr. rhythmnikos, L. rhythmicus. See RHYTHM.] 1. Of or pertaining to rhythm; having rhythm; duly regulated by cadences, accents, and quantities. 'My rhythmic thought.' E. B. Browning.

The love of rhythmic accent is something inherent in human nature, and not dependent on accidents of time, place, and habits. Even the very physical basis of music is rhythm, since the distinction between what we recognize as musical sounds, and those which are not so consists in the isochronous character of the vibrations of the former. Ed. Rev.

2. In med. periodical.

Rhythmically (rith'mik-al-i), adv. In a rhythmic manner; with rhythm.

Rhythmics (rith'miks), n. That branch of music which treats of the length of sounds and of emphasis.

Rhythming† (rith'ming), a. Rhyming. 'Witness that impudent lie of the rhythming monk.' Fuller.

Rhythmless (rith'mles), a. Destitute of rhythm. Coleridge.

Rhythmometer (rith-mom'et-ēr), n. [Gr. rhythmos, and metron, measure.] An instrument for marking time to movements in music. See METRONOME.

Rhythmus (rith'mus), n. [L.] Same as Rhythm.

Rhytidoma (ri-tid'o-ma), n. [Gr. rhytos, flowing, and dōma, a house.] In bot. a formation of plates of cellular tissue within the lber or mesophloeum.

Rhytina (ri-ti'na), n. [Gr. rhytis, a furrow, a wrinkle.] A genus of plant-eating cetaceans, or rather sirenians, allied to the manatee and dugong, but approximately edentate, having bony palatal apparatus for crushing its food. The only species known was the R. Stelleri, now extinct. It was discovered about the middle of last century on Behring's Island, off Kamchatka, and described by M. Steller, whence the name. It was an animal of great size, some specimens measuring 25 feet in length and 20 feet at the greatest circumference. It was exterminated soon after its discovery.

Rial (rē'al), n. A Spanish coin. See REAL.

Rial (ri'al), n. [An old form of royal.] A royal; a gold coin of varying value, formerly current in Britain. In the reign of Henry VI. the gold rial was current for 10s.; in the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's reign, golden rials were coined at 15s. each; and in the reign of James I. there were rose-rials of gold at 30s., and spur-rials at 15s. Spelled also Ryal.

Rialto (rē'al'tō), n. A bridge over the Grand Canal in Venice.

On the Rialto every night at twelve
I take my evening walk of meditation. Otway.

Riancy (ri'an-si), n. [See RIANT.] State or character of being riant; cheerfulness; gaiety.

If it were not that the tone, in some parts, has more of riancy, even of levity, than we could have expected. Carlyle.

Riant (ri'ant or rē-ān), a. [Fr., ppr. of rire, L. ridere, to laugh.] Laughing; gay; smiling; as, a riant landscape.

Goethe's childhood is throughout of riant, joyful character. Carlyle.

Rib (rib), n. [A. Sax. rib, ribb; cog. D. rib, ribbe, L.G. ribbe, Dan. ribben (that is rib-bone), G. rippe, a rib, Icel. rif, a rib—also a reef of rocks.] 1. One of the curved bones springing from the vertebral column and inclosing a certain number of the important organs and viscera in man and other vertebrate animals. The ribs in the human body are twelve on each side, proceeding from the spine to the sternum, or toward it, and serving to inclose and protect the heart, lungs, &c. The seven upper ribs are called true ribs, and the five lower ones false ribs. See PLEURAPOPHYSIS.—2. That which resembles or is considered to resemble a rib in form, use, position, &c.; as, (a) in ship-building, one of the bent timber or metallic bars which spring from the keel, and which form or strengthen the side of a ship. (b) In arch. (1) an arch-formed piece of timber for supporting the lath-and-plaster work of domes, vaults, &c.; (2) a plain, or variously moulded, clustered, and ornamented moulding on the interior of a vaulted roof; (3) a curved member of an arch centre; (4) a term sometimes applied to the mouldings of timber roofs, and those forming tracery on walls and in windows. (c) In bot. one of the principal pieces of the framework of a leaf, especially the central longitudinal vein, or any similar elevated line above a body. (d) One of the curved parts on which anything expanded rests for support; specifically, one of the extension rods on which the cover of an umbrella is stretched. (e) A prominent line or rising on cloth, as in corduroy. (f) Anything long and narrow; a strip. 'A small rib of land, that is scarce to be found without a guide.' Echard. (g) In mach. an angle-plate cast between two other plates, to brace and strengthen them, as between the sole and wall-plate of a bracket. (h) In mining, a pillar of coal left as a support for the roof of a mine. (i) In bookbinding, one of the ridges on the back of a book, which serve for covering the tapes and for ornament.—3. A wife, in allusion to Eve, our common mother, formed out of Adam's rib. 'Punch and his rib Joan.' Sir W. Scott. [Familiar.]—Ribs of a parrel (naut.), short pieces of wood having holes through which are reeved the two parts of the parrel-ropes.

Rib (rib), v.t. pret. & pp. ribbed; ppr. ribbing.

1. To furnish with ribs; to form with rising lines and channels; as, to rib cloth.—2. To inclose with ribs; to shut in. Shak.—3. To plough so as to leave rib-like ridges somewhat apart. Loudon. See RIBBING.

Ribadoquin, Ribadequin (ri-bad'ō-kwin, ri-bā'de-kwin), n. [Sp. ribadoquin, Fr. ribadequin; comp. ribard, a soldier, member of a forlorn hope.] A mediæval engine of war, consisting of a kind of war-chariot fortified with iron spikes, placed in front of an army arrayed for battle. In the fourteenth century they were furnished with small cannons. The name was also given to a powerful cross-bow for throwing long darts.

Ribald (ri'bald), n. [O.E. also ribard, ribard, O.Fr. ribard, ribault, ribard, lewd, lecherous; It. ribaldo, a person of the lowest class and most profligate character; from O.H.G. hrība, hrīpa, M.H.G. hrībe, a prostitute.] A low, vulgar, brutal wretch; a lewd fellow; a foul-mouthed fellow.

Ne'er a sprig of laurel graced those ribalds,
From dashing Bently down to piddling Tibbalds. Pope.

Ribald (ri'bald), a. Low; base; mean; vile; obscene. Shak.

Ribaldish (ri'bald-ish), a. Disposed to ribaldry. 'A ribaldish tongue.' Bp. Hall.

Ribaldrous (ri'bald-rus), a. Containing ribaldry. J. M. Mason.

Ribaldry (ri'bald-ri), n. The talk of a ribald; obscene language; indecency; obscenity.

The ribaldry of his conversation moved astonishment even in that age. Macaulay.

Riband (ri'bānd), n. See RIBBON.

The setting of flowers in hair, and of ribands on dresses, were also subjects of frequent admiration with you. Ruskin.

Riband (ri'bānd), v.t. To adorn with ribands; to ribbon. 'Ribanded with green and yellow.' B. Jonson.

Riband-weed (ri'bānd-wēd), n. The common name in some districts of the ordinary form of Laminaria saccharina.

Ribaud,† Ribaudet,† n. [See RIBALD.] A ribald; a man of loose character; a rogue, vagrant, or the like.

Ribadequin. See RIBADOQUIN.

Ribaudrie,† n. Ribaldry; indecent words or actions. Chaucer.

Ribaudrous,† Ribaudred† (ri'bād-rus, ri'bād-red), a. Obscene; lewd; lascivious. 'Yon ribaudred nag of Egypt.' Shak.

Ribband (ri'bānd), n. Same as Riband. See RIBBON.

Rib-band (ri'bānd), n. In ship-building, (a) one of the long, narrow, flexible pieces of wood nailed temporarily on the outside of the frames lengthwise, so as to encompass the vessel and keep the framework in position and impart stability to the skeleton. (b) A square timber of the slip fastened lengthways in the bilgeways to prevent the timbers of the cradle slipping outwards during launching.

Ribband-line (rib'band-lin), n. In ship-building, one of the diagonal lines on the body-plan, by means of which the points called surmarks, where the respective bevellings are to be applied to the timbers, are marked off upon the mould.

Ribband-nail (rib'band-nāl), n. In ship-building, a nail having a large round head with a ring to prevent the head from splitting the timber or being drawn through; used chiefly for fastening ribbands. Written also Ribbing-nail.

Ribbed (ribd), p. and a. Furnished with ribs; as, ribbed with steel; inclosed as with ribs; marked or formed with rising lines and channels; as, ribbed cloth.

And thou art long, and lank, and brown,
As is the ribbed sea-sand. Wordsworth.

Ribbing (rib'ing), n. 1. An assemblage or arrangement of ribs, as the timber work sustaining a vaulted ceiling, ridges on cloth, veins in the leaves of plants, &c.—2. In agri. a kind of imperfect ploughing, formerly common, by which stubbles were rapidly turned over, every alternate strip only being moved. By this method only half the land is raised; the furrow being laid over quite flat, and covering an equal space of the level surface. A similar operation is still in use in some places, after land has been pulverized by clean ploughings and is ready for receiving the seed, and the mode of sowing upon land thus prepared is also called ribbing.

Ribbing-nail (rib'ing-nāl), n. See RIBBAND-NAIL.

Ribble-rabble (rib'l-rab-l), n. [Reduplication of rabble.] 1. A rabble; a mob. 'A ribble-rabble of gossips.' John Taylor.—2. Silly or indecent talk. 'Such uncouth wretched ribble-rabble.' Hudibras Redivivus.

Ribble-row† (rib'l-rō), n. A list; a catalogue.

This witch a ribble-row rehearses,
Of scurvy names in scurvy verses. Cotton.

Ribbon, Riband (rib'on, rib'and), n. [O.E. ribane, riban, ribant, &c., from O. and Prov. Fr. riban, Mod. Fr. riban, a word probably of Germanic origin, being derived, according to Diez, from D. ring-band, a necktie, lit. a ring-band; ban, from band, being also seen in one or two other French words. Others take it from D. rij, G. reihe, a row, a line, and band. Or perhaps the French word is from the Celtic; comp. Gael. ribean, a ribbon, a fillet for the hair; rib, ribe, a hair; Ir. rib, riban, a ribbon; W. rhīb, what is thinly laid in a row or streak; rhībin, a narrow row, a streak; Armor. ribbin, an alley, a passage between two walls.] 1. A fillet of silk, satin, &c.; a narrow web of silk, satin, or other material, generally used for an ornament, or for fastening some part of female dress. The terms blue ribbon and red ribbon are often used to designate the orders of the Garter and Bath respectively, the badge of the former being supported by a blue ribbon, and that of the latter by a red ribbon. See BLUE-RIBBON.

Who but a woman . . . enriched her favourite ornament with four changes of costume, as riband, ribon, ribbon, ribband! Cornhill Mag.

2. What resembles a ribbon in some respects; a narrow, thin strip of anything; as, (a) in metal working, a long, thin strip of metal, such as a watch-spring; a thin steel band for a belt, or an endless saw; a thin band of magnesium for burning; a thin steel strip for measuring, resembling a tape-line, &c. (b) A continuous strand of cotton or other fibre in a loose, untwisted condition; a silver. (c) A shred; as, sails torn to ribbons. (d) pl. Carriage reins.

Ribbon (rib'on), v.t. To adorn with ribbons; to furnish with ribbons or stripes resembling ribbons.

Each her ribbons'd tambourine
Flinging on the mountain sod,
With a lovely frightened mien,
Came about the youthful god. Mat. Arnold.

Ribbon.

Ribbon (rib'on), a. Of or pertaining to Ribbonism.

Ribbon-brake (rib'on-brāk), n. A brake having a band which nearly surrounds the wheel whose motion is to be checked.

Ribbon-fish (rib'on-fish), n. The popular name of the fishes of the genus Cepola, acanthopterygious fishes belonging to the Cepolidae family and order Teleostei. The peculiar characters of the genus are indicated by the name, the species being distinguished by their lengthened bodies, much flattened at the sides, and their small scales.

Ribbon-grass (rib'on-gras), n. Canary-grass; a garden variety, striped with green and white, of Phalaris arundinacea, a grass which is found in its wild state by the sides of rivers. Called also Gardener's Garters.

Ribbonism (rib'on-izm), n. The principles of a secret association of Irishmen, which had its origin about 1808. The primary object of the association was antagonism to the Orange organization of the northern Protestants, to which was added the retaliation of agrarian oppression or injustice, real or supposed, by the assassination of landlords, land-agents, &c. The members were bound to each other by an oath, and had pass-words, signs, &c. They had their name from a piece of ribbon they wore as a badge. Each local association was called a lodge.

Ribbon-jasper (rib'on-jas-pér), n. A name given to those varieties of jasper in which the colours are arranged in parallel layers or stripes, like ribbons. It is a product of argillaceous strata metamorphosed by contact with hot igneous rocks.

Ribbon-lodge (rib'on-loj), n. An assembly of Ribbonmen or their place of meeting.

Ribbonman (rib'on-man), n. A member of an Irish Ribbon association or lodge. See RIBBONISM.

Ribbon-worm (rib'on-wér-m), n. A name given to individuals of the Nemertida (which see).

Ribes (ri'béz), n. [From Ribas, a name given by the Arabian physicians of the eleventh and twelfth centuries to a species of rhubarb, and erroneously supposed to apply to our currant plants.] A genus of plants forming the nat. order Grossulaceæ (which see). It is well known as producing the currant and gooseberry, and also for affording many of the ornamental shrubs of our gardens. The species are natives of the mountains, hills, woods, and thickets of the temperate parts of Europe, Asia, and America.

Rib-grass, Ribwort (rib'gras, rib'wért), n. A British plant of the genus Plantago, the P. lanceolata. See PLANTAGINÆÆ.

Ribibe† (rib'ib), n. 1. A musical instrument; a rebec. Chaucer. See REBEC.—2. [Comp. ribald.] An old bawd.

Or some good ribibe about Kentish town
Or Hogsden, you would hang now for a witch.
B. Jonson.

Ribible†, n. A small ribibe or rebec. Chaucer.

But I'll riroast thee and bumbast thee still
With my enraged muse, and angry quill.
John Taylor.

Ribston-pippin (rib'ston-pip-in), n. [From Ribston, in Yorkshire, where Sir Henry Goodricke planted three pips obtained from Rouen in Normandy. Two died, but one survived to become the parent of all the Ribston apples in England. Brewer.] A fine variety of apple.

Rib-supported (rib'sup-pört-ed), a. Supported or sustained by ribs.

Rib-vaulting (rib-vält'ing), n. In arch. vaulting having ribs projecting below the general surface of the ceiling to strengthen and ornament it.

Ribwort (rib'wért). See RIB-GRASS.

-Ric. A termination denoting jurisdiction, or a district over which government is exercised, as in bishopric, A. Sax. cýne-ric, king-ric. It is the A. Sax. rice, power, dominion, kingdom, realm; G. reich, D. rijk, Goth. reiki, dominion; from the same root as E. right, rich, L. rego, to rule, whence regal, region, &c. As a termination of proper names it denotes rich or powerful, as in Frederick, rich in peace.

Ricciaceæ (rik-si-ā'sē-ē), n. pl. [In honour of P. Francisco Ricciò, a Florentine botanist.] A nat. order of liverworts, or Hepaticæ, consisting of delicate, green, membranous fronds, spreading on the ground or floating in water. The fruits are always sessile on the frond, more or less embedded in its substance according to the thickness; the spores are unaccompanied by elaters. They are mostly natives of warm climates.

Rice (ris), n. [Fr. riz or ris, from L. oryza, from Gr. oryza, oryzon, rice, from Ar. ruḥ, rice in the husk.] A plant of the genus Oryza and its seed. (See ORYZA.) There is only one important species, O. sativa. The plant is probably originally a native of India, but it is now cultivated in all warm climates, and the grain forms a large portion of the food of the inhabitants. In America it grows chiefly on low moist land, which can be overflowed. It is a light and nutritious food, and very easy of digestion. Rice is an annual, erect, simple, round, and jointed, from 1 to 6 feet high; the leaves are large, firm, and pointed, arising from very long, cylindrical, and finely striated sheaths; the flowers are disposed in a panicle somewhat resembling that of the oats; the seeds are white and oblong, but vary in size and form in the numerous varieties. There is an immense variety in the qualities of rice, but the rice raised on the low marshy grounds of Carolina is unquestionably very superior to any brought from any other quarter. Of the rice imported from the East that from Patna is the most esteemed. Canada rice, or the wild rice of North America, is the Zizania aquatica, quite different from the true rice. The seeds are farinaceous, and much used for food by the Indians.

Rice (Oryza sativa).

Rice-bird (ris'bér-d), n. 1. A bird of the United States, the Emberiza oryzivora, or Dolichonyx oryzivorus, so named from its feeding on rice. In New England it is called bobolink or dob-lincoln. Called also Rice-bunting or Rice-tropical. See BOBOLINK.—2. One of the names of the paddy-bird or Rice-bird (Loxia oryzivora).

Java sparrow, the Loxia oryzivora. In Java and other parts of Asia where it is found it commits great ravages in the rice fields with its sharp and powerful bill. It is admired for its elegant shape and colouring.

Rice-biscuit (ris'bis-ket), n. A biscuit made with flour, with a greater or less portion of rice mixed, sweetened with sugar, and flavoured and enriched with butter, currants, &c.

Rice-bunting (ris'bunt-ing), n. Same as Rice-bird, 1.

Rice-dust (ris'dust), n. The refuse of rice which remains when it is cleaned for the market, consisting of the husk, broken grains, and dust; rice-meal. It is a valuable food for cattle.

Rice-flour (ris'flū), n. Ground rice for making puddings, &c.

Rice-glue (ris'glū), n. A species of glue made by boiling ground rice in soft water to the consistence of thin jelly.

Rice-meal (ris'mél), n. Same as Rice-dust.

Rice-milk (ris'milk), n. Milk boiled and thickened with rice.

Rice-paper (ris'pā-pér), n. 1. Paper made from rice straw, used in Japan and elsewhere.—2. A substance prepared from the central cellular portion or pith of the stem of Aralia papyrifera. The stem of the plant is cut into lengths and the woody part removed. The pith is then, by means of a sharp knife, carefully pared from the circumference to the centre so as to form a rolled layer of equal thickness throughout, the cellular structure being easily seen under the microscope. It is brought from China, where it is used as a material for painting upon and for the manufacture of several fancy and ornamental articles. It is sometimes erroneously stated to be prepared from rice.

Rice-pudding (ris'pud-ing), n. Pudding made of milk and rice, with eggs and sugar, and often enriched with fruit, as currants, gooseberries, apples, &c.

Rice-shell (ris'shel), n. A species of shell of the genus Olivæ.

Rice-soup (ris'sop), n. A kind of soup made with rice, enriched and flavoured with butter, cream, veal, chicken, or mutton stock, a little salt and pepper, and thickened with flour.

Rice-tropical (ris'trô-pi-al), n. The same as Rice-bird, 1.

Rice-water (ris'wâ-tér), n. Water thickened by boiling rice in it, sweetened with sugar and flavoured with cinnamon, cloves, nutmeg, or the like. It is a pleasant drink, and is often given in cases of diarrhoea.

Rice-weevil (ris'wé-vil), n. An insect, the Calandra oryzae, resembling the common wheat-weevil, which preys on rice, maize, &c.

Rice-wine (ris'win), n. A highly intoxicating liquor made by the Chinese from rice.

Rich (rich), a. [Partly from Fr. riche, rich, partly from A. Sax. ricc, rich, powerful, the two words having no doubt amalgamated. The French word is from O.H.G. riche (Mod. G. reich), rich, this again being cog. with A. Sax. ricc, Icel. rkgr, Goth. reiks, rich, the root being that of E. right. Riches is not from rich, but directly from the French.]

1. Having abundant material possessions; possessing a large portion of land, goods, or money, or any other valuable property; opulent; wealthy: opposed to poor.

Abram was very rich in cattle, in silver, and in gold. Gen. xiii. 2.

2. Hence, generally, well supplied; abounding; as, a rich entertainment; a rich treasury.

If life be short it shall be glorious;
Each moment shall be rich in some great action. Rome.

3. Abundant in materials; producing ample supplies; yielding great quantities of any thing valuable; productive; fertile; fruitful; as, a rich mine; rich ore; rich soil; rich crop.

Where the gorgeous East with richest hand
Showers on her kings barbaric pearl and gold. Milton.

4. Composed of valuable, precious, or costly materials or ingredients; procured at great outlay; highly valued; sumptuous; costly; as, rich presents; rich furniture. 'Richer than these diamonds.' Tennyson.

Rich and rare were the gems she wore,
And a bright gold ring on her wand she bore. Moore.

5. Abounding in nutritive or agreeable qualities; abounding in qualities gratifying the sense of taste; especially, as applied to articles of food, highly seasoned or abounding in oleaginous ingredients; to articles of drink, sweet, luscious, or highly flavoured; as, a rich dish; rich cream or soup; rich pastry; rich fruit; rich wine.—6. Fully or largely gratifying the sense of sight; not faint or delicate; vivid; bright; as, rich colours. 'Rich windows that exclude the light.' Gray.—7. Gratifying or agreeable to the sense of hearing; sweet; mellow; soft; harmonious; as, a rich tone; rich music. 'Or voice the richest toned that sings.' Tennyson.—8. Abounding in humour; highly provocative of amusement or laughter; funny; laughable; as, a rich idea; a rich joke.

'A capital party, only you were wanted. We had Beaumanoir and Vere, and Jack Tufton and Spraggs.'—'Was Spraggs rich?'—'Wasn't he! I have not done laughing yet. He told us a story about the little Biron, who was over here last year.'—'Killing! Get him to tell it to you. The richest thing you ever heard.' Disraeli.

—The rich, used as a noun, denotes a rich man or person, or more frequently in the plural, rich men or persons.

The rich hath many friends. Prov. xiv. 20.

This word is often used in the formation of compounds which are self-explanatory; as, rich-coloured, rich-fleeced, rich-haired, rich-laden, &c.

Rich't (rich'), v.t. To enrich. See ENRICH.

Of all these shadows, ev'n from this line to this,
With shadowy forests and with champaigns rich'd. Shak.

Richardia (rich-ar'di-a), n. [In honour of L. C. Richard, an eminent French botanist.] A genus of plants, nat. order Araceæ, of which only one species is known (R. æthi- opica), a native of the Cape of Good Hope. It is one of the most beautiful of aroidous plants, with large, handsome, glossy leaves, and white spathes, growing vigorously in the ordinary apartments of a house, and may be made to blossom all the year round. It was introduced into this country under the name of Calla æthiopica, and is often known as the white arum, lily of the Nile, or trumpet lily.

Richard Roe. See JOHN DOE.

Richardsonia (rich-ârd-sô-ni-a), n. [In memory of Richard Richardson, an English botanist.] A genus of plants, nat. order Rubiaceæ. The species are natives of America. They are trailing plants with woody roots covered with a thick rough rind, and small flowers clustered together in heads at the ends of the branches, and surrounded by an involucre. R. scabra (white ipeacacuanha) inhabits tropical America, and possesses properties similar to those of Cephaelis Ipeacacuanha.

Riches (rich'ez), n. [From Fr. richesse (sing.), lit. richness, from riche, rich. See RICH.] 1. That which makes rich; an abundance of land, goods, or money; abundant possessions; wealth; opulence; affluence.

Riches do not consist in having more gold and silver, but in having more in proportion than our neighbours. Locke.

2. That which is or appears rich, precious, sumptuous, or the like. 'The riches of heaven's pavement, trodden gold.' Milton.

This word, as may be inferred from the etymology, is really in the singular number, but is very rarely so used, the apparently plural termination having caused it to be regarded as a plural, and to be so used. It is a singular in the following examples.

And for that riches, where is my deserving? Shak.
For in one hour so great riches is come to nought. Rev. xviii. 17.

SYN. Wealth, opulence, affluence, wealthiness, richness, plenty, abundance.

Richesse, n. [Fr.] Wealth. Pl. Richesses. Riches. Chaucer.

Richly (rich'li), adv. In a rich manner: (a) with riches; with opulence; with abundance of goods or estate; with ample funds; as, a hospital richly endowed.

(b) Gaily; splendidly; magnificently; as, richly dressed; richly ornamented. (c) Plentifully; abundantly; amply; as, to be richly paid for services. (d) Highly; strongly; abundantly; as, a chastisement richly deserved.

Richness (rich'nes), n. The state or quality of being rich; that which makes or constitutes anything rich; any good quality existing in abundance; as, (a) opulence; affluence; wealth; as, a man noted for richness. (b) Fullness of supply; abundance; as, the richness of a treasury. (c) Productiveness; fertility; fruitfulness; as, the richness of the soil; the richness of a mine or of an ore, &c. (d) Abundance of precious or valuable material or ingredients; value; costliness; as, richness of furniture, dress, ornaments, &c. (e) Abundance of nutritive or agreeable qualities; as, richness of food, wines, odours, &c. (g) Abundance of whatever gratifies the ear; sweetness; melodiousness; harmoniousness; as, richness of tone. (h) The quality of being highly amusing or entertaining; the quality of being extremely funny or laughable; as, the richness of a joke.

Ricinic (ri-sin'ik), a. [See RICINUS.] A term applied to an acid obtained by distilling castor-oil at a high temperature.

Ricine (ris-i'nin), n. An alkaloid contained in the seeds of the castor-oil plant (Ricinus communis), and in those of Croton Tiglium. It forms colourless rectangular prisms and laminae, having a slight taste of bitter almonds, insoluble in water, soluble in alcohol, nearly insoluble in ether and in benzene.

Ricinoleine (ris-i-nol'ë-in), n. [L. ricinus, castor-oil plant, and oleum, oil.] In chem. a fatty substance obtained from castor-oil, of which it is the chief constituent. It yields on saponification oxide of glyceryl and a liquid acid called ricinolic acid.

Ricinolic (ris-i-nol'ik), a. In chem. pertaining to or obtained from castor-oil; as, ricinolic acid.

Ricinus (ris'i-nus), n. [From L. ricinus, a tick—from the seeds resembling ticks.] A genus of apetalous plants, nat. order Euphorbiaceæ. The best known species is the R. communis or palma Christi, which produces the castor-oil. It is conjectured to be originally from Barbary, and it grows abundantly in India. In warm countries it is ligneous and perennial; in cold, herbaceous and annual. The varieties are numerous. See CASTOR-OIL.

Rick (rik), n. [A. Sax. hredc, a rick, a stack, a heap; cog. Icel. hraukr, a pile, as of fuel; same root as in W. erug, Ir. cruach, a heap, pile, rick.] 1. A stack or pile of corn or hay, the lower part being generally of a cylindrical form, and the top part rounded or conical, and often thatched so as to protect the pile from rain.—2. A small pile or heap piled up in the field by the gatherer. [Provincial English.]

Rick (rik), v.t. To pile up in ricks.

Rickers (rik'erz), n. pl. The stems or trunks of young trees cut up into lengths for stowing flax, hemp, and the like, or for spars for boat masts and yards, boat-hook staves, &c.

Ricketish (rik'et-ish), a. Somewhat rickety; rickety. Fuller. [Rare.]

Rickets (rik'ets), n. [Formed with pl. suffix -ets, from wrick, O.E. wriken, to twist, thus denoting a disease accompanied by distortion; allied to wring and wriggle. Skeat.] A disease considered by some medical writers as a special disease of the bones, and by others as merely one of the various forms of scrofula. It commonly appears after the age of nine months, and before that of two years, attacking principally the bones. The characteristic symptoms are a large head, prominent forehead, projecting breast-bone, flattened ribs, big belly, and emaciated limbs, with great debility. The bones and spine of the back are variously distorted. Nature frequently restores the general health, but leaves the limbs distorted.

Rickety (rik'et-i), a. 1. Affected with rickets. 'Rickety children.' Arbuthnot.—2. Like a child affected with rickets; feeble in the joints; feeble or imperfect in general. 'Crude and rickety notions.' Warburton.—3. Threatening to fall; approaching ruin; shaky; as, a rickety building.

Rickle (rik'l), n. [Scotch.] 1. Any loose or confused heap.—2. A little rick or stack.

May Boreas never thrash your rigs,
Nor kick your rickles at their legs. Burns.

Rick-stand (rik'stand), n. A basement of timber or iron, or sometimes wholly or partly of masonry, on which corn ricks or stacks are built. The object of rick-stands is to keep the lower part of the stack dry, and exclude vermin.

Ricochet (rik'o-shet), n. [Fr. Etym. unknown.] A rebounding from a flat surface, as of a stone from water or of a cannon-ball from the ground; the motion familiarly known as duck-and-drake.—Ricochet fire, ricochet firing, the firing of guns, mortars, or howitzers with small charges and low elevation, so as to cause the balls or shells to roll and bound along. It is very destructive, as the rebound causes the shot or shell to pass along a great space almost upon the ground, destroying all that it meets with in its way. It is frequently used in sieges to clear the face of a ravelin, bastion, or other work, dismounting guns and scattering men; and may also be used against troops in the field.—Ricochet battery, a battery for firing in this manner.

Ricochet (rik'o-shet'), v.t. pret. & pp. ricochetted; ppr. ricochetting. To operate upon by ricochet firing.

Ricochet (rik'o-shet'), v.i. To skim, as a stone, along the surface of water; hence, to be 'made ducks and drakes of; to be squandered or dissipated. 'Her money has not ricocheted.' Dickens.

Ricture (rik'tūr), n. A gaping. Bailey.
Rictus (rik'tus), n. [L., the opened mouth.] 1. In bot. the throat, as of a calyx, corolla, &c.; the opening between the lips of a ringent or personate flower.—2. In ornith. the space surrounding the base of the bill; the gape.

Rid (rid), v.t. pret. & pp. rid or ridded; ppr. ridding. [A. Sax. hreddan, to take, whence ahreddan, ariddan, to rid, to set free, &c.; cog. Icel. ryða (ryðja), to clear, to empty, from hrjóða (hrjóða), to clear; Dan. rydde, to clear, to remove.] 1. To free; to deliver; to take away or save. 'That he might rid him out of their hands.' Gen. xxxvii. 22.

I will rid you out of their bondage. Ex. vi. 6.
2. To separate; to drive away. [Rare.]
I will rid evil beasts out of the land. Lev. xxvi. 6.

3. To free; to clear; to disencumber; as, to rid one of his care. 'Must rid all the sea of pirates.' Shak. 'Resolved at once to rid himself of pain.' Dryden.

I never ridded myself of an overmastering and brooding sense of some great calamity threatening toward me. De Quincey.

4. To dispose of; to finish; to despatch. 'For willingness rids way.' Shak.
Mirth will make us rid ground faster than if thieves were at our tails. Webster.

5. To make away with; to remove by violence; to destroy.

But if you ever chance to have a child,
Look in his youth to have him cut off
As, death'smen, you have rid this sweet young prince. Shak.

Rid (rid), pp. or a. Free; clear; as, to be rid of trouble.—To get rid of, to free one's self from.

Reduce his wages, or get rid of her. Cowper.

Rid (rid), pret. of ride. Shak.

Riddance (rid'ans), n. 1. The act of ridding or freeing; a cleaning up or out; a clearing away.

Thou shalt not make clean riddance of the corners of thy field. Lev. xxiii. 22.

2. A getting rid of something; the state of being rid or free; freedom; escape; deliverance. 'Riddance from all adversity.' Hooker.—A good riddance, fortunate relief from a person's company; sometimes almost equivalent to the person or thing that it is well to be quit of.

His mother indignantly declared that a girl who could so conduct herself was indeed a good riddance. Dickens.

Ridden (rid'n), pp. of ride.
Ridder (rid'ér), n. One who or that which rides.

Riddle (rid'dl), n. [A. Sax. hriddel, a riddle or sieve, hridan, a fan, hridrian, to winnow; cog. O.H.G. hritard, a sieve, hritarôn, to sift. The word had originally an initial guttural, and is from same root as L. cerno, to sift (whence discern, discreet, &c.); Gr. krînô, to separate, search, judge; comp. Ir. criathar, a sieve, a riddle.] A kind of large sieve with coarse meshes, usually of wire, but sometimes of basket-work, employed for separating coarser materials from finer, as chaff from grain, cinders from ashes, gravel from sand, coal from dross, and the like.

Riddle (rid'l), v.t. pret. & pp. riddled; ppr. riddling. 1. To pass through or separate with a riddle, as grain from the chaff, cinders from ashes, &c.—2. To perforate with balls, so as to make like a riddle; to make little holes in; as, a house riddled with shot.

Riddle (rid'l), n. [A. Sax. rædels, a riddle, from rædan, to read, discern, conjecture, guess; D. raadsel, G. räthsel, from the same verbal stem. See READ.] 1. A proposition put in obscure or ambiguous terms to puzzle or exercise the ingenuity in discovering its meaning; something proposed for conjecture, or that is to be solved by conjecture; a puzzling question; an enigma. Judg. xiv. 2. Anything ambiguous or puzzling.

'Twas a strange riddle of a lady. Hudibras.

Riddle (rid'l), v.t. pret. & pp. riddled; ppr. riddling. To solve; to explain; to unriddle.

Riddle me this, and guess him if you can.
Who bears a nation in a single man? Dryden.

Riddle (rid'l), v.i. To speak ambiguously, obscurely, or enigmatically.

Riddling confession finds but riddling shift. Shak.
He laugh'd as is his wont, and answer'd me
In riddling triplets of old time. Tennyson.

Riddler (rid'l-ér), n. 1. One who riddles.—

2. One who propounds riddles; one who speaks ambiguously or obscurely.

Riddingly (rid'l-ing-li), adv. In the manner of a riddle; enigmatically; obscurely; ambiguously; secretly. Donne.

Ride (rid), v.i. pret. rode; pp. ridden; ppr. riding. Rid for the pret. & part. is not now used. [A. Sax. ridan; similar forms are in the other Teutonic tongues, as L. G. riden, D. rijden, Icel. rida, Dan. ride, G. reiten, O. G. ritan—to ride. Raid and road, as well as ready, are from this stem.] 1. To make progression sitting on an animal's back; to be carried on the back of an animal, as on a horse.

Brutus and Cassius
Are rid like madmen through the gates of Rome. Shak.

2. To travel or be carried in a vehicle; as, to ride in a carriage, wagon, or the like.

The richest inhabitants exhibited their wealth, not by riding in gilded carriages, but by walking the streets with trains of servants. Macaulay.

3. To be borne on or in a fluid; as, a ship rides at anchor; a balloon rides in the air.

Calm and serene he drives the furious blast,
And, pleased the Almighty's orders to perform,
Rides in the whirlwind, and directs the storm. Addison.

4. To be supported in motion; to rest on something.

Strong as the axle-tree
On which heaven rides. Shak.

5. To have ability as an equestrian.

He rode, he fenced, he moved with graceful ease. Dryden.

6. To support a rider, as a horse; to move under the saddle; as, this horse rides easy or hard, fast or slow.—To ride at anchor (naut.), to lie at anchor; to be anchored.—To ride easy, when a ship does not labour or feel a great strain on her cables.—To ride hard is when a ship pitches violently, so as to strain her cables, masts, and hull.—A rope is said to ride when one of the turns by which it is wound lies over another, so as to interrupt the operation or prevent its rendering.—To ride to hounds, to ride close behind the hounds in fox-hunting.

He not only went straight as a die, but rode to hounds instead of over them. Lawrence.

Ride (rid), v.t. 1. To sit or be supported on, so as to be carried; as, to ride a horse. 'Others . . . ride the air in whirlwind.' Milton.—2. To go over in riding; as, he rode a mile; he rode the distance in an hour.—3. To do, make, or execute by riding. 'Ride mine errands.' Sir W. Scott.

And we can neither hunt nor ride
A foray on the Scottish side. Sir W. Scott.

4. To manage insolently at will; to tyrannize or domineer over: often met with as a participle in compound words, as in priest-ridden, 'A land that was king-ridden, priest-ridden, peer-ridden.' Charlotte Brontë.

The nobility could no longer endure to be ridden by bakers, cobblers, and brewers.

—To ride down, (a) to overthrow, trample on, or drive over in riding; hence, to treat with extreme roughness or insolence.

They love us, and we ride them down. Tennyson.

(b) Naut. to bend or bear down by main strength and weight; as, to ride down a sail.—To ride out, to continue afloat during, and withstand the fury of, as a vessel does a gale.

Ridicule (rid'ikül), n. [Fr., from L. ridiculus, laughable, from rideo, to laugh, to laugh at.] 1. Expression or action intended to convey contempt and excite laughter; contemptuous mockery or jesting; wit of that species which provokes contemptuous laughter.

Ridicule is too rough an entertainment for the polished and refined. It is banished from France, and is losing ground in England. Kames.

2. That species of writing which excites contempt with laughter. It differs from burlesque, which may excite laughter without contempt, or it may provoke derision. Kames.—3. Ridiculousness. [Rare.]

It does not want any great measure of sense to see the ridicule of this practice. Addison.

SYN. Derision, wit, banter, raillery, burlesque, mockery, irony, satire, sarcasm, gibe, jeer, sneer.

Ridicule (rid'ikül), v.t. pret. & pp. ridiculed; ppr. ridiculing. To treat with ridicule; to treat with contemptuous merriment; to represent as being deserving of contemptuous mirth; to mock; to make sport or game of; to deride.

I've known the young, who ridiculed his rage, Love's humblest vassals when oppressed with age. Goldsmith.

SYN. To deride, banter, rally, burlesque, mock, satirize, lampoon.

Ridicule (rid'ikül), a. Ridiculous.

This action . . . was brought to court, and became so ridiculous, that Sylvanus Scory was so laughed at and jeered, that he never delivered the letter to the queen. Aubrey.

Ridiculer (rid'ikül-ér), n. One that ridicules.

The ridiculer shall make only himself ridiculous. Chesterfield.

Ridiculize† (ri-dik'ül-liz), v.t. To ridicule. Chapman.

Ridiculous (ri-dik'ül-us), a. [L. ridiculus, ridiculous. See RIDICULE.] 1. Worthy of or fitted to excite ridicule; laughable and contemptible; as, a ridiculous dress; ridiculous behaviour.

Thus was the building left Ridiculous, and the work confusion named. Milton.

Agriicola, discerning that these little targets and unwieldy glaives, ill pointed, would soon become ridiculous against the thrust and close, commanded three Batavian cohorts . . . to draw up and come to handy strokes. Milton.

One step above the sublime makes the ridiculous, and one step above the ridiculous makes the sublime again. T. Paine.

2. Involving or expressing ridicule or contemptuous laughter. 'It provokes me to ridiculous smiling.' Shak. [Rare.]—SYN. Lucidicrous, laughable, risible, droll, absurd, preposterous.

Riding (rid'ing), p. and a. 1. Employed for riding on; as, a riding horse.—2. Employed to travel on any occasion.—Riding interests. In Scots law, when any of the claimants in an action of multiple-poining, or in a process of ranking and sale, have creditors, these creditors may claim to be ranked on the fund set aside for their debtor; and such claims are called riding interests.

Riding (rid'ing), n. 1.† A royal procession. 2. A ride; a district visited by an officer.—3. A road cut in a wood or through pleasure-grounds, for the exercise of riding therein. Called also a Ride.

Riding (rid'ing), n. [A Sax. trithring, trithring, a third part, from thri, three. The initial t was easily lost in consequence of the difficulty of recognizing its sounds in the compounds North-, East-, West-trithring.] One of the three districts into which the county of York, in England, is divided, anciently under the government of a reeve. These are called the North-, East-, and West Ridings.

Riding-clerk (rid'ing-klärk), n. An old name for a mercantile traveller; also, one of the six clerks formerly in chancery.

Riding-day (rid'ing-dä), n. A day of hostile incursions on horseback. Sir W. Scott.

Riding-habit (rid'ing-ha-bit), n. A garment worn by females when they ride or travel on horseback. T. Warton.

Riding-hood (rid'ing-hud), n. A hood formerly used by females when they rode; a kind of cloak with a hood. Gay.

Riding-house (rid'ing-hous), n. See RIDING-SCHOOL.

I hope you apply the time you have saved from the riding-house to useful more than to learned purposes. Chesterfield.

Riding-master (rid'ing-mas-tér), n. A teacher of the art of riding; specifically, milit. one who instructs soldiers and officers in the management of horses. He is generally selected from the ranks, and has the rank of lieutenant. After an aggregate service of 30 years, during 15 of which he has been riding-master, he may retire with the rank of captain.

Riding-rhymes (rid'ing-rimz), n.pl. Couplet rhymes, in opposition to such as are alternate or mixed in any way.

Faire Leda reads our poetry sometimes, But saith she cannot like our riding-rhymes; Affirming that the cadens falleth sweeter, When as the verse is placed between the meter. Sir J. Harrington.

Riding-rod (rid'ing-rod), n. A riding stick; a switch.

Who? he that walks in gray whisking his riding-rod. Beau. & Fl.

Riding-school (rid'ing-sköl), n. A school or place where the art of riding is taught.

Riding-skirt (rid'ing-skért), n. A skirt used by a woman when riding.

Riding-whip (rid'ing-whip), n. A whip used when riding.

Ridotto (ri-dot'tô), n. [It., from L. redactus, a retreat. See REDOUBT.] 1. A public assembly. 'Ridotto, a company, a crew, or assembly of good fellows; also a gaming or tabling house, where good company doth meet.' Florio.—2. A musical entertainment consisting of singing and dancing, in the latter of which the whole company join. It is a favourite public Italian entertainment, held generally on fast eves. 'No routs, no shows, no ridottos.' Johnson.

Twice a week there were to be ridottos at guinea tickets. H. Walpole.

Ridotto (ri-dot'tô), v.i. To frequent ridottos. [Rare.]

Riet-bok (ri'et-bok), n. [D. riet, a reed, and bok, a buck.] The Dutch name for an antelope of South Africa, which lives in reedy marshes (Eleotragus arundinaceus). Called also Reed-buck.

Reiver (re'vēr), n. A robber; a despoiler: more commonly written Reiver, and sometimes Reaver. See REIVER. [Scotch.]

Rifacimento (re-fä-ché-men'tô), n. [It.] A remaking or re-establishment: a term most commonly applied to the process of recasting literary works so as to adapt them to a changed state of circumstances; an adaptation, as when a work written in one age or country is modified to suit the circumstances of another.

Rife (rif), a. [A Sax. ryff, rife, prevalent; Icel. ryfr (allied to reifa, to enrich, to cheer), O.D. ryf, ryf, plenteous, munificent.] 1. Prevaling; prevalent; abundant; common; as, reports of his death were rife. 'Those heats and animosities so rife amongst us.' Waterland.

The plague was then rife in Hungary. Knolles.

2. Supplied or filled with in large numbers or great quantity; abounding in; replete. 'Fair plains once rife with populous cities.' Athenæum.—3.† Clear; manifest.

Whence even now the tumult of loud mirth Was rife and perfect in my listening ear. Milton.

4.† Ripe; ready; easy.

Hath utmost Inde ought better than his owne? Then utmost Inde is neare and rife to gone. Bp. Hall.

Rife,† Rive,† v.t. [See RIVE.] To thrust through. Chaucer.

Rifely (rif'li), adv. In a rife manner; prevalently; frequently.

It was rifely reported that the Turks were coming in a great fleet. Knolles.

Rifeness (rif'nes), n. The state of being rife; frequency; prevalence.

Riffle (rif'l), n. [G. riffeln, to groove.] A kind of trough used in gold washing.

Riffler (rif'lér), n. [G. riffel-feile.] A kind of file with a somewhat curved extremity, suitable for working in small depressions.

Riffraff (rif'raf), n. [A reduplication of raff, refuse.] 1. Sweepings; refuse of anything. 2. The rabble.

Rifle (rif'l), v.t. pret. & pp. rifled; ppr. rifling. [O.Fr. rifler, rifler, to sweep away, a word of Germanic origin, the same stem being seen in raff, raffle.] 1. To seize and bear away by force; to snatch away. 'Till time shall rifle ev'ry youthful grace.' Pope.—2. To strip; to rob; to pillage; to plunder. 'You have rifled my master.' Sir R. L'Estrange. 3.† To raffle.

If you do not like that course, but do intend to be rid of her, rifle her at a tavern. Webster.

Rifle (rif'l), v.i. 1. To rob; to pillage. Chapman.—2.† To raffle. Sir R. L'Estrange.

Rifle (rif'l), n. [A foreign name introduced with the foreign invention; lit. a grooved musket. Dan. rifle, a groove or fluting, rifle, to rifle a gun, to groove a column, riffler, a rifle; G. riefeln, to channel, riefe, a groove.] 1. A gun about the usual length and size of a musket, the inside of whose barrel is rifled, that is, grooved, or formed with spiral channels. See Rifled arms under the following verb.—2. pl. A body of troops armed with rifles; as, the Cape mounted Rifles; the Canadian Rifles; &c.—3. [See RIFLER.] A sort of whetstone or instrument for sharpening scythes. [Local.]

Rifle (rif'l), v.t. pret. & pp. rifled; ppr. rifling. 1. To groove; to channel.—Rifled arms, firearms in which spiral grooves are cut in the surface of the bore. The groove is simply a portion of the thread of a female screw with a long pitch, the inclination being much less than one turn in the length of the bore. The object of rifling a gun is to give the projectile a rotation round an axis coincident with that of the bore, which insures greater accuracy of fire. If a spherical shot be used no other advantages follow; but if an elongated projectile be employed, not only is the accuracy increased, but longer range and more destructive force are obtained. Elongated projectiles, generally cylindrical in shape, with a conoidal head, have, therefore, entirely superseded spherical shot for rifled arms.—2. To whet, as a scythe, with a rifle. [Local.]

Rifle-ball (rif'l-bal), n. A ball for firing with a rifle. Such balls are not now spherical, as formerly, but generally cylindrical, with a conoidal head, the base being usually hollowed and fitted with a plug, which causes the bullet to expand into the grooves of the bore of the weapon. See Rifled arms under RIFLE, v.t.

Rifle-bird (rif'l-bêrd), n. An Australian bird (Ptiloris paradiseus), of the family Upupidae, with a long curved bill, found only in the very thick bush. It is about the size of a large pigeon. The plumage in the upper parts is velvety black tinged with purple, in the under parts velvety black, diversified with olive-green; the tail is black, the two central feathers rich metallic green; the crown of the head and throat are covered with lustrous emerald-green specks. The male is considered the most splendidly plumaged of Australian birds.

Rifle-corps (rif'l-kör), n. 1. A body of soldiers armed with rifles.—2. A body of volunteers trained to the use of the rifle.

Rifleman (rif'l-man), n. A man armed with a rifle; specifically, one of a body of troops armed with rifles, and formerly more or less employed as sharpshooters. The name has now lost nearly all its meaning, as infantry soldiers in general are now provided with rifles. Previous to 1854 the riflemen in the British army were the exception, only two regiments, the 60th and the 95th, having rifles, the others having the smooth-bore musket.

Rifle-pit (rif'l-pit), n. A pit or short trench in front of an army, fort, &c., generally about 4 feet long and 3 feet deep, with the earth thrown up in front so as to afford cover to two skirmishers. Sometimes they are loopholed by laying a sand-bag over two other bags on the top of the breastwork so that the head and shoulders of the rifeman are covered.

Rifler (rif'l-ér), n. One that rifles; one that pillages; a robber. Milton.

Fäte, fär, fat, fäll; më, met, hër; pine, pin; nôte, not, möve; tûbe, tub, bull;

oil, pound; ü, Sc. abune; ý, Sc. fey.

Rift (rift), n. [From rive; Dan. rift, a rift, rent, fissure.] A cleft; a fissure; an opening made by riving or splitting. 'Should soldier up the rift.' Shak.

He starts and lifts
His head through the blackened rifts
Of the crags that keep him down. Longfellow.

Rift (rift), v.t. To cleave; to rive; to split; as, to rift an oak or a rock. 'And rifted Jove's stout oak.' Shak.

Mother-age (for mine I know not) help me as when life began:
Rift the hills, and roll the waters, flash the lightnings, weigh the sun. Tennyson.

Rift (rift), v.i. 1. To burst open; to split.

Timber . . . not apt with ordnance. Bacon.

2. To belch. [Scotch.]

Rift (rift), n. [Comp. D. rif, a shallow place in the sea, a reef. See REEF.] A shallow place in a stream; a fording place. [Local.]

Rig (rig), n. [Scotch.] [See RIDGE.] 1. A ridge of land; a strip of land between two furrows.

May Bores never thresh your rigs,
Nor kick your rickles off their legs. Burns.

2. The back of an animal.—3. A course; a path or way.

Rig (rig), v.t. pret. & pp. rigged; ppr. rigging. [Origin doubtful; perhaps originally to put on the back, from old rig, A. Sax. hrycg, the back.] 1. To dress; to put on; to clothe; generally followed by out, and used only colloquially or when the dress is of a gay, fanciful, or odd description.

Jack was rigged out in his gold and silver lace, with a feather in his cap. Sir R. L'Estrange.

2. To furnish with apparatus or gear; to fit with tackling; as, to rig a purchase.—3. To supply with rigging; to fit, as the shrouds, stays, braces, &c., to their respective masts and yards.—To rig out a boom, to run out a pole upon the end of a yard or bowsprit to extend the foot of a sail.—To rig in a boom, to draw it in from its situation upon the end of a yard or bowsprit, &c.—To rig the market, to raise or lower prices artificially in order to one's private advantage; especially, in the stock exchange, to enhance fictitiously the value of the stock or shares in company, as when the directors or officers buy them up out of the funds of the association; or when fictitious stock is put in circulation. [The word in this sense may be from rig, a frolic or trick.]

Rig (rig), n. [See the verb.] 1. Dress; usually, gay or fanciful dress.—2. Naut. the peculiar manner of fitting the masts and rigging to the hull of any vessel; thus, schooner-rig, ship-rig, &c., imply the masts and sails of those vessels without regard to the hull.

Rig (rig), n. [Origin doubtful; Wedgwood compares Manx reagh, ruttish, wanton, riggan, to rut.] 1. A romp; a wanton; a strumpet. 'Fy on thee, thou rampe, thou rig.' Bp. Hall.—2. A ridgel (which see).—3. A frolic; a trick.

The one expressed his opinion that it was a 'rig,' and the other his conviction that it was a 'go.' Dickens.

—To run a rig, to play a sportive or wanton trick.

Away went Gilpin, neck or nought,
Away went hat and wig;
He little dreamt when he set out
Of running such a rig. Cowper.

—To run the rig (or one's rig) upon, to practise a sportive trick on.

I am afraid your goddess of bed-making has been running her rig upon you. Smollett.

Rig (rig), v.i. To play the wanton. Chapman.
Rigadon (rig-a-don'), n. [Fr. rigadon, rigadon. Litré quotes from Rousseau to the effect that he heard a dancing-master say the word came from Rigado, the surname of the inventor of the dance.] A gay brisk dance performed by one couple, and said to have been borrowed from Provence, in France.

Riga-fr (rè'ga-fér), n. A name given to the variety of the red or Scotch pine or fir (Pinus sylvestris) which comes to us from Riga. See SCOTCH PINE.

Rigation (ri-gi'shon), n. [L. rigatio, rigationis, from riga, to water. Akin G. regen, E. rain.] The act of watering; irrigation. H. Swinburne.

Rigel (ri-jel), n. [Ar. rijil, a person's foot.]

A bright fixed star of the first magnitude in the left foot of the constellation Orion.

Rigger (rig'ér), n. 1. One who rigs or dresses; specifically, one whose occupation is to fit the rigging of a ship.—2. In mach. a cylindrical pulley or drum.

Rigging (rig'ing), n. 1. Tackle; particularly, the ropes which support the masts, extend and contract the sails, &c., of a ship. This is of two kinds, standing rigging, as the shrouds and stays; and running rigging, comprehending all those ropes used in bracing the yards, making and shortening sails, &c., such as braces, sheets, halliards, clewlines, &c.—2. The back; the ridge of a house; the top of anything; a roof. Gavin Douglas; Burns. [Scotch.]

Riggin-tree (rig'in-trè), n. A roof-tree. [Scotch.]

Riggish (rig'ish), a. Having the qualities of a rig or bad woman; hence, wanton; lewd.

For vilest things
Become themselves in her; that the holy priests
Bless her when she is riggish. Shak.

Riggle (rig'l), n. A name given to a species of sand-eel, the Ammodytes lancea, or small-mouthed lance.

Riggle (rig'l), v.t. To move one way and the other. See WRIGGLE.

Truth . . . forbids us to riggle into her presence through by-paths, and the cloudy medium of falsehood. Warburton.

Right (rit), a. [A. Sax. riht, right, true, just, straight; cog. D. recht, G. recht, O. G. reht, Goth. raihts, straight, garaihts, just, Isel. rétrr, Dan. ret. These are participial forms corresponding to the cognate L. rectus, straight, part. pret. of rego, rectum, to rule, direct (whence such words as regal, reign, direct, &c.); the root being seen also in Gr. oreô, to stretch out; Skr. rîu, straight, rîj, to rule (whence rajah); Ir. and Gael. righ, a sovereign; W. rhaith, right, law; Armor. reiz, rez, right, just. Reach and rich are ultimately from same root.] 1. In conformity with the rules which ought to regulate human action; in accordance with duty; agreeably to the standard of truth and justice or the will of God; not wrong; just; equitable. That alone is right in the sight of God which is consonant to his will or law; this being the only perfect standard of truth and justice. In social and political affairs, that is right which is consonant to the laws and customs of a country, provided these laws and customs are not repugnant to the laws of God. 'His conduct still right, with his argument wrong.' Goldsmith.

The adjective right has a much wider signification than the substantive right. Everything is right which is conformable to the supreme rule of human action; but that only is a right, which, being conformable to the supreme rule, is realized in society, and vested in a particular person. Hence the two words may often be properly opposed. We may say that a poor man has no right to relief, but it is right he should have it. A rich man has a right to destroy the harvest of his fields, but to do so would not be right. Whewell.

I would not have my right Rosalind of this mind, for, I protest, her frown might kill me. Shak.

In this battle . . . the Britons never more plainly manifested themselves to be right barbarians. Milton.

4. Not erroneous or wrong; according to fact or truth.

If there be no prospect beyond the grave, the inference is certainly right. 'Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die.' Locke.

5. Passing a true judgment; not mistaken or wrong; not in error.

You are right, justice, and you weigh this well. Shak.

The world will not believe a man repents;
And this wise world of ours is mainly right. Tennyson.

6. Not left, but its opposite; originally, no doubt, most useful or dexterous; as, the right hand; hence, being on the same side as the right hand; as, the right ear or eye.

She, on his left side, craving aid for Henry,
He, on his right, asking a wife for Edward. Shak.

—Right bank of a river, the bank on the right hand of a person whose face is turned in the direction in which the water runs; as, the right bank, or south side of the Thames.

7. Most favourable or convenient; fortunate.

The lady has been disappointed on the right side. Spectator.

8. Properly done, made, placed, disposed, or adjusted; orderly; well regulated; well performed; correct; as, the sum is not right; everything about the room was put right; the drawing is not right.—9. Most direct or leading in the proper direction; as, the right way from London to Oxford.—10. Applied to the side to be placed or worn outward; as, the right side of a piece of cloth.—11. Rind (rind), v.t. To take the rind from; to bark; to decorticate.

Rinderpest (rin'dér-pest), n. [G. rinder, pl. of rind, a horned beast, and pest, a plague.]

A most virulent and eminently contagious disease or plague, characterized by eruptive fever or exanthema, affecting ruminant animals, especially cattle, though capable of existing in sheep and goats. The disease is indigenous to the western steppes of Russia, and is communicable only by contagion or inoculation. The contagious matter is believed to consist of very minute particles of living matter, growing or multiplying at a rate far exceeding that of the growth of the normal germinal matter of the blood and tissues, so that they appropriate the pabulum of the tissues, and grow at their expense. They incubate after being received into the system, so that the disease does not declare itself openly till forty-eight hours after the poison has been imbibed. This disease has caused great havoc among cattle for at least a thousand years, spreading occasionally like a pestilence over Europe. During an outbreak in this country in 1867 between 200,000 and 300,000 cattle died of it or were ordered to be killed on account of it. The name is also given to an eminently fatal cattle disease of America, differing, however, from the true rinderpest in attacking cows only, and in running its course in three days in place of seven, the general duration of the European form of the disease.

Rindle (rin'dl), n. [From run, O.E. and Sc. rin; comp. runnel.] A small water-course or gutter.

And come, whatever loves to weep,
And hear the ritual of the dead. Tennyson.

Ritualism (rit'ū-al-izm), n. 1. A system of ritual.—2. Observance of prescribed forms in worship; strict regard or reverence for external forms in religion; the name commonly given to the increased attention to ceremonial which has taken place in a section of the Anglican Church. The changes made in the ritual have been generally in the direction of a more sensuous and ornate worship, and the infusion into outward forms of a larger measure of the typical element, with the object to assimilate the Anglican service as much as possible to that of other Catholic churches. Among the important innovations made are the following:—Special vestments at the celebration of the holy communion, and at certain other times; lighted candles on the altar at holy communion; the burning of incense; the mixing of water with wine for the communion; the use of water bread; elevation of the elements either during or after consecration; the attendance of non-communicants at the holy communion; and processions with crosses, banners, and vested attendants. Various judgments have been given in the ecclesiastical courts against extreme Ritualists, and some of their proceedings, as the elevation of the host, have been pronounced illegal.

Ritualist (rit'ū-al-ist), n. One skilled in or devoted to a ritual, or to external forms in worship; especially, one of the party in favour of ritualism in the Church of England. See RITUALISM, 2.

Ritualistic (rit'ū-al-ist'ik), a. 1. Pertaining or according to the ritual; adhering to rituals.—2. Pertaining to or characterized by the practices of the party in favour of an elaborate ritual in the Church of England; excessively or prominently observant of forms of ritual. See RITUALISM, 2.

River (riv'ér), n. One who rives or splits. Echard.

River (riv'ér), n. [O. Fr. riviere, Prov. Fr. riveire, Mod. Fr. rivière, a river; It. riviera, a bank, shore, a river, from an old fem. noun riparia, a river, from L. riparius, of or pertaining to, or frequenting, the banks of a river, from ripa, a bank or shore. The primary sense was land on the border of a river, then the course of the river itself.] 1. A large stream of water flowing through a certain portion of the earth's surface and discharging itself into the sea, a lake, marsh, or other river. A brook or rivulet is the name given to small streams of water, and a river is a stream of considerable size usually formed by the union of several such smaller streams. Rivers often join other rivers, and thus a large river is produced. This is called the principal river, and those which increase its waters are called, with respect to it, affluents or tributaries, and sometimes feeders or branches. All the rills, streams, and rivulets which ultimately gather into one river form a river system; and the region of country which is drained by such a system is called a river basin. Basins are usually separated from each other by ranges of hills or mountains; and the line of demarcation between these basins, the line or axis of greatest elevation, is called the watershed. The first waters of a river are generally derived from springs, or from the gradual meltings of the ice and snow which perpetually cover the summits of all the most elevated ranges of mountains upon the globe. This is called the source of a river. From this source the river descends through the lowest part of its basin or drainage area until it terminate its course, the termination being called the mouth of the river. The cavity in which the running water flows is called the bed of the river, and the solid land which bounds this bed is called its banks. Most of the rivers in the tropical regions are subject to periodical overflows of their banks in consequence of the rains which annually fall in such abundance in those countries during the wet season. Another cause is the melting of snow and ice in the neighbourhood of their source.—River Terrace, in geol. a terrace on the side of a valley through which a river flows, formed by the action of the water when the river bed was at a higher elevation than now.—2. A large stream; copious flow; abundance; as, rivers of blood; rivers of oil. 'The full-flowing river of speech.' Tennyson.

River (riv'ér), v.t. To hawk by the side of a river; to fly hawks at river fowl. Halliwel.

River-bed (riv'ér-bed), n. The bed or bottom of a river.

River-crab (riv'ér-krab), n. A name given to a genus of crabs (Thelphusa), inhabiting fresh water, and having the carapace quadrilateral and the antennæ very short. One species (T. depressa) inhabits muddy lakes and slow rivers in the south of Europe, and is often found figured on ancient Greek medals. It is the grancio of the Italians, is an esteemed article of food, and is much used in Italy during Lent.

River-craft (riv'ér-kraft), n. Small vessels or boats which ply on rivers and do not put to sea.

River-dragon (riv'ér-dra-gon), n. A crocodile; a name given by Milton to the king of Egypt, in allusion to Ezek. xxix. 3.

River-driver (riv'ér-driv-ér), n. A name given by lumbermen to one whose business it is to conduct logs down running streams. Bartlett. [American.]

Riveret (riv'ér-et), n. A small river; a rivulet. Drayton.

River-plain (riv'ér-plan), n. A plain by a river.

River-side (riv'ér-sid), n. The bank of a river. Goldsmith.

River-snail (riv'ér-snal), n. See PALUDINIDÆ.

River-terrace (riv'ér-ter-äs), n. In geol. see RIVER.

River-tortoise (riv'ér-tor-tois), n. A name common to the members of the family Trionycidae, order Chelonida. The river-tortoises are aquatic in their habits, coming to shore only to deposit their eggs. They are exclusively carnivorous, subsisting on fishes, reptiles, birds, &c., which they eat in the water. The edges of the mandible are so sharp and firm that they easily snap off a man's finger. Well-known species are the soft-shelled turtle (Trionyx ferox) and the large and fierce snapping turtle (Chelydra serpentina) of America. The carapace is covered, not with hard horny plates as in other tortoises, but with a tough leathery skin. Hence they are sometimes called soft tortoises. They inhabit almost every river and lake in the warmer regions in the Old and New Worlds, and are particularly plentiful in the Ganges, where they prey on human bodies.

River-wall (riv'ér-wal), n. In hydraulic engin. a wall made to confine a river within definite bounds, either to prevent denudation or erosion of the banks, to prevent overflow of the adjacent land, or to concentrate the force of the stream within a smaller area for the purpose of deepening a navigable channel.

River-water (riv'ér-wa-tér), n. The water of a river as distinguished from rain-water, spring-water, &c.

Rivery (riv'ér-i), a. 1. Of or pertaining to rivers; resembling rivers.

Thy full and youthful breasts, which in their meadowy pride,
Are branch'd with rivery veins, meanderlike that glide. Drayton.

2. Abounding in rivers; as, a rivery district. 'A rivery country.' Drayton. [Rare in both senses.]

Rivet (riv'et), n. [Fr. rivet, a clinch, a rivet; river, to rivet; origin doubtful, probably from the Teutonic; comp. Icel. rifa, to tack together, to sew together.] A short metallic pin or bolt passing through a hole and keeping two pieces of metal (or sometimes other substances) together; especially, a short bolt or pin of wrought iron, copper, or of any other malleable material, formed with a head and inserted into a hole at the junction of two pieces of metal, the point after insertion being hammered broad so as to keep the pieces closely bound together. Rivets are usually hammered or closed up when they are in a heated state, so as at once to facilitate the operation of clinching and to draw the pieces more firmly together by the contraction of the rivet when cool. It is in this manner that boilers, tanks, &c., are made. Instead of being closed by hammering, the rivets are now often closed by means of powerful machinery, which makes better joints than can be made by hand, and executes the work far more quickly.

The armourers accomplishing the knights,
With busy hammers closing rivets up,
Give dreadful note of preparation. Shak.

Rivet (riv'et), v.t. pret. & pp. riveted; ppr. riveting. 1. To fasten with a rivet or with rivets; as, to rivet two pieces of iron. 'Sat riveting a helmet on his knee.' Tennyson.—2. To clinch; as, to rivet a pin or bolt. 3. Fig. to fasten firmly; to make firm, strong, or immovable; as, to rivet friendship or affection.

For I mine eyes will rivet to his face. Shak.

Rivet and nail me where I stand, ye powers! Coingreve.

Rivet-boy (riv'et-boi), n. The boy who in the operation of riveting takes the rivets from the furnace.

Riveter (riv'et-ér), n. One who rivets.

Riveting (riv'et-ing), p. and a. Clinching; fastening firmly.—Riveting machine, a machine for clinching rivets. The principle of the riveting machine is simply the bringing a powerful lever to bear upon the head of the rivet so that the workman can hammer upon the other and softened end without displacing it.

Riveting (riv'et-ing), n. 1. The act of joining with rivets.—2. A set of rivets taken collectively.

Rivet-joint (riv'et-joint), n. A joint formed by a rivet or by rivets.

Rivo (ri'vo), interj. An exclamation in drinking bouts. Shak.

Rivose (ri'vös), a. [L. rivus, a brook.] Marked with furrows which do not run in a parallel direction, but are rather sinuate; used especially in zool.

Rivulet (riv'ül-et), n. [L. rivulus, dim. of rivus, a river.] A small stream or brook; a streamlet.

By fountain or by shady rivulet,
He sought them. Milton.

Rixation (rik-sä'shon), n. [L. rixatio, rixationis, from rixar, to brawl or quarrel.] A brawl or quarrel. [Rare.]

Rixatrix (rik-sä'triks), n. A quarrelsome woman; a common scold. Bouvier. [Rare.] Rix-dollar (riks'dol-lér), n. [Sw. riksdaler, Dan. rigsdaler, G. reichsthaler, lit. the dollar of the realm.] A silver coin of Germany, Holland, Denmark, Sweden, &c. Its value varies, ranging between 2s. 6d. and 4s. 6d. sterling. Not now current.

Rizom (riz'om), n. In her. the grain of oats, agreeing with the ear of other corn.

Rizzered (riz'ér), a. Half dried and salted; as, rizzered fish. Sir W. Scott.

Roach (róch), n. [A. Sax. reohhe, D. roch, G. roche.] 1. A fish of the genus Cyprinus or carps, the C. rutilus. It inhabits the lakes, ponds, and slow-running rivers of England and of the south of Scotland, and is common in most of the rivers in the temperate parts of Europe. Its colour is a grayish-green, the abdomen being silvery white, and the fins red. It is gregarious, and the shoals are often large. Its average weight is under a pound, and though a favourite with anglers, it is not much esteemed for the table.—As sound as a roach, perfectly sound; perhaps a corruption of Fr. roche, a rock. The phrase may have arisen by a kind of pun, roche being the old spelling of roach.

Roach (Cyprinus rutilus).

Roach (róch), n. The curve or arch cut in the foot of some square sails from one clue to the other, to keep the foot clear of stays and ropes.

Road (ród), n. [A. Sax. rád, a riding, a journey on horseback, a road, from rádan, to ride (which see). Ráid is a collateral form.] 1. An open way or public passage; ground appropriated for travel, forming a line of communication between one city, town, or place and another for foot-passengers, cattle, vehicles, &c. Roads are of various kinds, according to the state of civilization and wealth of the country through which they are constructed, and according to the nature and extent of the traffic to be carried on upon them. The word is generally applied to highways, and as a generic term it includes highway, street, lane, &c. See MACADAM-ROAD, TUNPIKE-ROAD. Hence—2. A means or way of approach or access; a path. 'The road to error.' Locke.—3. A place where ships may ride at anchor at some distance from the shore; a roadstead; usually in the plural; as, Yarmouth Roads.

My father at the road
Expects my coming, there to see me shipp'd. Shak.

4. A journey; a ride. 'At last, with easy roads, he came to Leicester.' Shak.—5. An inroad; incursion of an enemy; a raid.

Cason was desirous of the spoil, for he was, by the former road into the country, famous and rich. Knolles.

—On the road, passing; travelling.—To take the road, set out on a journey.—To take to the road, to go robbing travellers on the highway.—SYN. Highway, street, lane, pathway, way, route, passage, course.

Road-bed (ród-bed), n. 1. The bed or foundation on which the superstructure of a railway rests.—2. The whole material laid in place and ready for traffic in common roads.

Road-roller (rôd-rôl'êr), n. A heavy cylinder used for compacting the surfaces of roads.

Road-scraper (rôd-skrâp'êr), n. A large hoe or machine for scraping or cleaning roads.

Roadstead (rôd'sted), n. See ROAD, 3.

Road-steamer (rôd-stêm'êr), n. A locomotive with broad wheels suitable for running on common roads.

Roadster (rôd'stêr), n. 1. A horse well fitted for travelling, or usually employed in travelling.—2. A person much accustomed to driving; a coach-driver.—3. Naut. a vessel which works by tides, and seeks some known road to await turn of tide and change of wind. Admiral Smyth.

Road-sulky (rôd'sul-ki), n. A light conveyance which can accommodate only one person; hence the name. Called also Sulky.

Road-surveyor (rôd'sêr-vâ-êr), n. A person who supervises roads and sees to their being kept in good order.

Roadway (rôd'wâ), n. A highway; a road; particularly, the part of a road used by horses, carriages, &c.

'My caution has misled me,' he continued, pausing thoughtfully when he was left alone in the roadway. W. Collins.

Road-weed (rôd'wêd), n. A plant of the genus Plantago.

Plantago major, minor, and lanceolata, called plantains, or road-weeds, are among the commonest of our weeds on roadsides, in meadows, and all undisturbed ground where the soil is not very light. Heuff.

Road (rôm), v.i. [O.E. rōme, also rāme, to roam or rove; comp. O.H.G. rāmen, to aim, to strive. A common but doubtful derivation is from Rome, the city, the term Roamers being anciently applied to pilgrims to Rome. Ramble is from this verb.] To wander; to ramble; to rove; to walk or move about from place to place without any certain purpose or direction. 'Daphne roaming through a thorny wood.' Shak.

Home to their several cells they bear the store, Cull'd of all kinds, then roam abroad for more. Crabbe.

SYN. To wander, rove, range, stroll, ramble, stray.

Road (rôm), v.t. To range; to wander over; as, to roam the woods. 'To range the woods, to roam the park.' Tennyson.

Road (rôm), n. Act of wandering; a ramble. The boundless space through which these rovers take their restless roams, suggest the sister thought, Of endless time. Young.

Roamer (rôm'êr), n. One who roams; a rover; a rambler; a vagrant.

Road (rôn), a. [O.Fr. roan, Mod.Fr. rouan, It. roano, rovano, Sp. ruano, roano, the colour of a horse having a mixture of bay and gray hairs; origin unknown.] Applied formerly to a horse of a bay, sorrel, or dark colour, with spots of gray or white thickly interspersed. At present, however, the word seems to be restricted to a mixture having a decided shade of red.

Road (rôn), n. 1. A leather, used largely in bookbinding, to imitate morocco, prepared from sheep-skin.—2. An animal, especially a horse, of a roan colour. 'Three pybalds and a roan.' Tennyson.—3. A roan colour; the colour of a roan horse.

Road-tree (rôn'trê), n. [See ROWAN.] The mountain-ash; the rowan-tree. See MOUNTAIN-ASH.

A branch of the road-tree is still considered good against evil influences in the Highlands of Scotland and Wales. Sir T. Dick Lauder.

Roar (rôr), v.i. [A. Sax. rārjan, L.G. rāren, D. reeren, Prov. G. yeren, rōren; probably from a root ending in s, and meaning voice, s becoming r, as in iron (see R); comp. Goth. razzda, speech, Dan. rôst, Icel. raust, the voice; Sc. roost, to bellow.] 1. To cry with a full, loud, continued sound; to bellow, as a beast; as, a roaring bull; a roaring lion. 2. To cry aloud, as in distress or anger.

How the poor souls roared, and the sea mocked them; and how the poor gentleman roared and the bear mocked him, both roaring louder than the sea or weather. Shak.

3. To make a loud, continued, confused sound, as winds, waves, a multitude of people shouting together, and the like; to give out a full, deep sound; as, the wind roars; the fire roars; the cannon roar. 'How oft I cross'd where carts and coaches roar'd.' Gay.

Well roars the storm to those that hear. Tennyson.

4. To laugh out loudly and continuously; as, the audience roared at his jokes.—5. To engage in riotous conduct. See ROARING, p. and a.—6. To make a loud noise in breathing, as horses in a certain disease. See ROARING.

Roar (rôr), n. 1. A full loud sound of some continuance; the cry of a beast; as, the roar of a lion or bull.—2. The loud cry of a person in distress, pain, anger, or the like.—3. A loud, continued, confused sound; as, the roar of the sea in a storm; the roar of a tempest; the roar of cannon. 'Streaming London's central roar.' Tennyson.

As the deep-domed empyrean Rings to the roar of an angel onset. Tennyson.

4. Clamour; outcry of joy or mirth; as, a roar of laughter.

Where be your gibes now? your gambols? Your songs? your flashes of merriment, that Were wont to set the table on a roar? Shak.

Roar (rôr), v.t. To cry aloud; to make known or proclaim loudly; to shout; as, to roar out one's name. 'Roar these accusations forth.' Shak.

This last action will roar thy infamy. Ford.

Roarer (rôr'êr), n. One who or that which roars: (a) a noisy, riotous person; a roaring boy; see under ROARING, p. and a. 'O strange! a lady to break glasses and turn roarer.' Massinger. (b) One who shouts or bawls.

The roarer is an enemy rather terrible than dangerous. He has no other qualification for a champion of controversy than a hardened front or a strong voice. Johnson.

Roaring (rôr'ing), n. 1. A loud cry, as of a lion or other beast; outcry of distress, anger, and the like; loud continued sound, as of the billows of the sea or of a tempest.

I hear the roaring of the sea. Tennyson.

2. A disease of the bronchial tubes in horses, which causes them to make a singular noise in breathing under exertion; the act of making the noise so caused.

Roaring (rôr'ing), p. and a. 1. Characterized by or making a noise or disturbance; disorderly; riotous. 'A mad, roaring time, full of extravagance.' Burnet.—Roaring boys, the old cant name for a set of noisy, riotous ruffians who infested the streets of London about the beginning of the seventeenth century. They corresponded to the Mohocks of a later period.

And whilst you do judge 'twixt valour and noise, To extinguish the race of the roaring boys. B. Jonson.

Roborate (rob'or-ât), v. t. [See above.] To give strength to; to strengthen; to confirm; to establish. Fuller.

Roboration (rob-o-râ-shon), n. [See ROBORANT.] A strengthening. [Rare.]

Roborean, Roboreous (rob-ô-rê-an, rob-ô-rê-us), a. [L. roboreus, from robur, strength, and an oak.] Made of oak; strong. [Rare.]

Roburite (rob'ë-rit), n. [L. robur, strength.] An explosive substance of recent introduction, having ammonium nitrate as its basis.

Robust (rô-bust'), a. [L. robustus, from robur, an old form of robur, an oak, strength.] 1. Possessed of or indicating great strength; strong; lusty; sinewy; muscular; vigorous; sound; as, a robust body; robust youth; a robust frame. 'His robust, distended chest.' Young. 'Robust, tough sinews, bred to toil.' Cowper.—2. Sound; vigorous; as, robust health.—3. Violent; rough; rude.

Romp-loving miss
Is haul'd about in gallantry robust. Thomson.

4. Requiring vigour or strength; as, robust employment.—SYN. Strong, lusty, sinewy, sturdy, muscular, hale, hearty, vigorous, forceful, sound.

Robustious (rô-bust'yus), a. Robust. 'These redundant locks (of Samson), robustious to no purpose.' Milton. [Obsolete, or now used only in a ludicrous sense or in contempt. So also its derivatives robustiously and robustness.]

In Scotland they had handled the bishops in a more robustious manner. Milton.

Robustiously (rô-bust'yus-li), adv. In a robustious manner; with vigour; sturdily. 'They come in robustiously.' B. Jonson.

Robustness, Robustuousness (rô-bust'yus-nes, rô-bust'ûs-us-nes), n. Vigour; muscular size and strength.

That robustness of body, and puissance of person, which is the only fruit of strength. Sandys.

Robustly (rô-bust'li), adv. In a robust manner; with great strength; muscularly.

Robustness (rô-bust'nes), n. The quality of being robust; strength; vigour, or the condition of the body when it has full firm flesh and sound health.

Roc (rok), n. The well-known monstrous bird of Arabian mythology, of the same fabulous species with the simurg of the Persians.

Rocamboles (rok'am-bôl), n. [Fr., from G. rockenbollen—rocken, rye, and bollen, a bulb, because it grows amongst rye.] Allium Scodoprasum, a garlic which grows in Denmark, &c., and is cultivated for the same purposes as the onion and garlic.

Rocella (rok-sel'-la), n. [Altered from the Portuguese rocha, a rock, in allusion to its place of growth.] A genus of lichens, one species of which (R. tinctoria) yields the dye so largely used in dyeing operations under the name of orchel or archil.

Roccellic (rok-sel'lik), a. Applied to an acid (C₁₇H₃₂O₄) obtained from Rocella tinctoria.

Roche, n. [Fr.] A rock. Chaucer.

Roche-alum (roch'al-um), n. [Fr. roche, a rock, and E. alum.] Rock-alum. Mortimer.

Roche-lime (roch'lim), n. Quicklime (which see).

Roche-powder (rô-shel'pou-dër), n. Same as Seidlitz-powder.

Roche-salt (rô-shel'salt), n. (KNaH₄C₆O₆).

4H₂O.) The double tartrate of soda and potash. It has a mild, hardly saline taste, and acts as a laxative.

Roche-moutonnée (rôsh-mô-ton-â), n. [Fr.—roche, a rock, and moutonné, sheep-like, from mouton, a sheep.] The name given to the rounded and smoothed humps of rock occurring in the beds of ancient glaciers from their fancied resemblance to the backs of sheep. They have received their form and smoothness from the action of ice.

Rochet (roch'et), n. [Fr. rochet, a blouse, a little jacket, from G. rock, O.H.G. hroch, O.E. and Sc. rock, a coat.] 1. A sort of short surplice, with tight sleeves, and open at the sides, formerly worn by priests and acolytes, but at present restricted to bishops and certain privileged canons.—2. A mantlelet worn during ceremonies by the peers of England.—3.† A loose round frock or upper garment. Chaucer.

Rochet (roch'et), n. [Dim. of roche, old spelling of roach.] A kind of fish, the roach (which see); or, according to Nares, the piper, one of the gurnards. 'Rochets, whittings, or such common fish.' W. Broune.

The whiting, known to all, a general wholesome dish. The gurnet, rochet, mayd, and mullet, dainty fish. Dryden.

Rock (rok), n. [A Scandinavian word. Icel. rokkur, Dan. rok, Sw. rock, a distaff; D. rokken, G. rocken.] A distaff used in spinning; the staff or frame about which flax, wool, &c., is arranged from which the thread is drawn in spinning.

Flow from the rock my flax, and swiftly flow,
Pursue thy thread, the spindle runs below. Parnell.

Rock (rok), v. t. [Dan. rokkke, to move, to shake; G. rücken, to move, to push.] 1. To move backwards and forwards, as a body resting on a support beneath; as, to rock a cradle; to rock a chair; sometimes to cause to reel or totter. It differs from shake, as denoting a slower and more uniform motion or larger movements. It differs from swing, which expresses a vibratory motion of something suspended.

A rising earthquake rock'd the ground. Dryden.
Me, let the tender office long engage
To rock the cradle of reposing age. Pope.

2. To move backwards and forwards in a cradle, chair, &c.; as, to rock a child to sleep. 'High in his hall, rock'd in a chair of state.' Dryden.—3. To lull; to quiet, as if by rocking in a cradle. 'Sleep rock thy brain.' Shak.

Rock (rok), v. t. To move backwards and forwards; to be moved backwards and forwards; to reel.

The rocking town
Supplants their footsteps; to and fro they reel.
F. Phillips.
During the whole dialogue Jonas had been rocking on his chair. Dickens.

The blind wall rocks, and on the trees
The dead leaf trembles to the bells. Tennyson.

Rock (rok), n. [Fr. roc, according to Brachet from a form rupicus, from L. rupes, a rock, roche, also a rock, being from rupes, a similar fern form. Littre regards it as of Celtic origin.] 1. A large mass of stony matter; a large fixed stone or crag; as, a projecting rock; the stony matter constituting the earth's crust, as distinguished from soil, mud, sand, gravel, clay, peat; as, a foundation composed of rock. In this general sense coal, shale, chalk, gypsum, salt, and the like, are not regarded as rock. 'A ragged, fearful, hanging rock.' Shak.

Ye darksome pines, that, o'er yon rocks reclined, Wave high, and murmur to the hollow wind. Pope.

2. In geol. any natural deposit or portion of the earth's crust, whatever be its hardness or softness. In this sense sand, mud, clay, peat, coal, gypsum, salt, are rocks. There are two grand divisions of rocks into aqueous and igneous, or those formed by the agency of water and those formed by the agency of fire. Aqueous rocks may be grouped into three classes, in accordance with the mode of their origin, viz. (a) mechanically formed rocks or sedimentary rocks, formed from the detritus or waste of older rocks brought down by rivers and deposited in the bed of the sea or of lakes. Sedimentary rocks are stratified. Sandstone is an example. (b) Organically formed rocks, or rocks consisting of accumulations of organic remains. Chalk and many limestones are remains of shells of animals; coal and peat of vegetables. (c) Chemically formed rocks, or rocks formed by chemical agency, as gypsum, rock-salt, and some limestones. The originally soft strata of aqueous rocks, as mud, sand, decayed vegetables, and the like, owe their consolidation chiefly to four causes, viz. pressure of superincumbent strata, heat, chemical agency, and infiltration of some material, as silica, or some salt of lime or iron, which acts as a cement. Stratified rocks, whose structure has become crystalline under the influence of heat and probably of chemical reagents, are called metamorphic rocks. (See METAMORPHO.) Igneous rocks have been divided into two sections, plutonic and volcanic. Plutonic rocks have been consolidated from a melted state underneath the ground under a great pressure. They are highly crystallized. Granite is an example. Volcanic rocks have been projected up from beneath in a molten state. They have also two divisions, crystalline and fragmental. Lava and basalt are examples of crystalline volcanic rocks. Tuff, which is consolidated volcanic dust and stones, is fragmental. Another division of volcanic rocks is into temporaneous and intrusive. Contemporaneous rocks are those which, being ejected from the crater of a volcano, have been poured on the surface of the earth or the bottom of the sea. The position of such a rock indicates the age of its ejection. Lava proper, and the toadstone of Derbyshire, are examples. Intrusive rocks are such as have been forced up from below in a molten state through the superincumbent sedimentary strata, altering the rocks they are in contact with, filling up fractures and branches, and so forming dykes and veins, and causing faults. Some basalts and traps are examples. They are simply ancient and very compact lavas. A single rock, or several rocks united by certain common characters, constitute a formation, as the chalk formation, the coal formation, because they have been formed or deposited under similar conditions. Several formations constitute a system. Thus the carboniferous system includes the lower coal, mountain limestone, millstone grit, and upper coal; the cretaceous system comprises not only calcareous, but also argillaceous and arenaceous rocks. The crust of the earth, so far at least as we can examine it, is chiefly made up of sedimentary and organic rocks. In these rocks therefore must the chief sources of evidence for the history of the earth be sought. If we could pile them up, one above another, in the order of their formation, they would form a mass probably more than a dozen miles thick. This constitutes the library out of which geological history must be compiled.—8. A stone of any size; a pebble. [Colloquial American.]

Rocella tinctoria (Archil).

I hold it is not decent for a scientific gent To say another is an ass—at least to all intent; Nor should the individual who happens to be meant Reply by heaving rocks at him to any great extent.

Bret Hart.
4. In Scrip. (fig.), defence; means of safety; protection; strength; asylum. 'The Lord is my rock.' 2 Sam. xxii. 2.—5. A cause or source of peril or disaster; as, this was the rock on which he split: a usage derived from vessels being wrecked on rocks.—6. A name for a kind of solid sweetmeat.—On the rocks, quite out of funds; in great want of money. [Slang.]

Rock (rok'), v.t. To throw stones at; to stone. [Southern and Western States of America.]

Rock (rok'), n. A fabulous bird which figures in Eastern tales. See Roc.

Rock-alum (rok'al-um), n. The purest kind of alum; properly, a reddish variety of native alum found near Clivja Vecchia in Italy.

Rockaway (rok'a-wā), n. A low four-wheeled carriage for two, with full standing top.

Rock-basin (rok'bā-sn), n. 1. In phys. geog. a basin or hollow of considerable size, scooped out by glacial or other action, entirely surrounded by rocky walls, and often containing a lake.

It is easy to see that lakes are the result of the formation of hollows, a great proportion of which are true rock-basins; that is to say, hollows entirely surrounded by solid rocks, the waters not being retained by mere loose detritus. A. C. Ramsay.

2. A basin-shaped cavity occurring in the granites of high and exposed regions like that of Dartmoor in Devonshire, and varying from 1 to many feet in diameter, and from a few inches to several feet in depth, with edges more or less sloping, and generally containing pebbles or other gravely detritus, whose motion, with the aid of water, seems to have been the efficient cause of their formation. Formerly it was popularly believed that these excavations were the work of the Druids. Page.

Rock-bound (rok'bound), a. Hemmed in by rocks.

The breaking waves dash'd high On a stern and rock-bound coast. Mrs. Hemans.

Rock-butter (rok'but-ēr), n. A soft, yellowish, somewhat unctuous admixture of alum, alumina, and oxide of iron oozing out of rocks containing alum. It is a product of decomposition. Page.

Rock-cod (rok'kod), n. A cod taken on rocky sea-bottoms. Rock-cod are considered the best.

Rock-cork (rok'kork), n. Mountain-cork, a white or gray-coloured variety of asbestos: so called from its lightness and fibrous structure.

Rock-cress (rok'kres), n. The common name of several species of cruciferous plants of the genus Arabis, one of which, A. alpina, a tufted plant with white flowers, is a common spring garden plant.

Rock-crowned (rok'kround), a. Crowned or surmounted with rocks; as, a rock-crowned height.

Rock-crystal (rok'kris-tal), n. Limpid quartz. When purest it is white or colourless, but it is found of a grayish or yellowish white, pale yellow, citrine, red, black, &c. The purple variety is known as amethyst, the yellow as topaz, and the amber-coloured as cairngorm, and so on. Its most usual form is that of hexagonal prisms surmounted by hexagonal pyramids.

Rock-doe (rok'dō), n. A species of Alpine deer. N. Greiv.

Rock-dove (rok'duv), n. Same as Rock-pigeon.

Rock-drill (rok'dril), n. A tool for drilling or boring rock by a chisel or rotatory motion. One of the many forms of this instrument is described under DIAMOND-BORER.

Rockelay, Rocklay (rok'e-lā, rok'lā), n. A short cloak; a roquelaure (which see). Written also Rokelay. [Scotch.]

Lucky Macleary, having put on her clean toy, rockelay, and scarlet plaid, gravely awaited the arrival of the company, in full hope of custom and profit.

Sir W. Scott.

Rocker (rok'ēr), n. 1. One who rocks anything, as a cradle. 'His fellow . . . was weary, and without a rocker slept.' Dryden. 2. The curving piece of wood on which a cradle or rocking-chair rocks.—3. A rocking-horse.

There were beasts of all sorts (in a toy-shop); horses, in particular, of every breed, from the spotted barrel on four pegs . . . to the thorough-bred rocker on his highest mettles. Dickens.

4. A rock-shaft (which see).—5. A cradle or trough for washing ore by agitation; as, a rocker for separating gold-dust from gravel, &c.

Rockery (rok'ēr-i), n. An artificial mound formed of stones or fragments of rock, earth, &c., for the cultivation of particular kinds of plants, as ferns.

Rocket (rok'et), n. Same as Rochet.

Rocket (rok'et), n. [It rochetta, from rocca, a distaff, a rock; from the German.] 1. A cylindrical tube of pasteboard or metal filled with a mixture of nitre, sulphur, charcoal, &c., which on being ignited at the base, propels it forward by the action of the liberated gases against the atmosphere. Rockets are used for various purposes, as (a) in war, when the apparatus generally consists of a sheet-iron case filled with a composition such as is described above, and a head which may be solid, or hollow and filled with a bursting charge. (b) Life-rocket, used for carrying a line over a wreck, and thus establishing a communication between a ship and the shore. (c) Signal or sky rockets, pasteboard cylinders filled with nearly the same composition, but with a conical head containing stars of various ingredients and colours, and a quantity of powder which, when the rocket has attained its greatest height, bursts the cylinder, causing the ignited stars to spread through the air and cast a brilliant or coloured light which may be seen at a good distance. They are used in signalling or for mere pyrotechnic display. They are kept point foremost in their flight by means of a stick projecting behind, which acts as the feathers of an arrow.

And the final event to himself (Mr. Burke) has been that, as he rose like a rocket, he fell like the stick. T. Paine.

2. The lever by which a forge bellows is inflated.

Rocket (rok'et), n. [Fr. roquette, Sp. ruqueta, It. ruchetta, from It. ruca, L. eruca, rocket.] A name applied to many plants, chiefly of the nat. order Crucifera. The common garden rocket is Hesperis matronalis.

Rocket-case (rok'et-kās), n. A stout case made of cardboard or cartridge-paper for holding the materials of a rocket.

Rock-fish (rok'fish), n. 1. The black goby, of the family Gobiidae.—2. A name also occasionally given to some of the wrasse genus, family Labridae.

Rock-goat (rok'gōt), n. A goat which makes its home among the rocks. Holland.

Rock-hearted (rok'hārt-ed), a. Hard-hearted; unfeeling.

Rockiness (rok'i-nes), n. State of being rocky or abounding with rocks.

Rocking (rok'ing), n. 1. The act of one who or that which rocks; the act of swaying or moving backwards and forwards.—2. A provincial term for the mass of stone or ballast laid to form the under stratum of a road.

Rocking (rok'ing), n. A social meeting of neighbours in some parts of Scotland: named from the old practice of the females taking their rock with them and spinning.

On Fasten-e'en we had a rockin', To ca' the crack and weave the stockin'. Burns.

Rocking-chair (rok'ing-chār), n. An arm-chair mounted on rockers.

Rocking-horse (rok'ing-hors), n. A wooden horse mounted on rockers, for the recreation of children; a hobby-horse.

Rocking-shaft (rok'ing-shaft), n. The shaft with levers on it which works the slide-valves in some steam-engines.

Rocking-stone (rok'ing-stōn), n. A large block of stone poised so nicely upon the point of a rock that a moderate force applied to it causes it to rock or oscillate. Sometimes also it consists of an immense mass, with a slightly rounded base resting upon a flat surface of rock below, so that an individual can move or rock it. Some rocking-stones are evidently artificial, having had a mass of rock cut round the centre point of their bases; others are due to natural causes, such as decomposition, the action of wind and water, &c. Several of these stones are found in this country, and a celebrated one at Cornwall has been computed to weigh upwards of 90 tons. Called also Logan, Loggan, or Logging-stone.

Rocking-tree (rok'ing-trē), n. The axle from which the lathe in a loom is suspended.

Rock-kangaroo (rok'kang-ga-rō), n. A marsupial of the genus Petrogale (which see).

Rock-leather (rok'leth-ēr), n. Same as Rock-cork.

Rockless (rok'les), a. Being without rocks.

I'm clear by nature as a rockless stream. Dryden.

Rocklet (rok'let), n. A small rock. Lord Lytton.

Rock-limpet (rok'lim-pet), n. The common limpet (Patella vulgaris).

Rockling (rok'ling), n. A species of fish of the cod family, the sea-loach; it belongs to the genus Motella of naturalists.

Rock-maple (rok'mā-pl), n. The sugar-maple (Acer saccharinum).

Rock-milk (rok'milk), n. Calc-tuff; a loose friable variety of carbonate of lime deposited from water. Called also Agario Mineral.

Rock-moss (rok'mos), n. Lecanora tartarea, the lichen which yields cudbear. It is much used in the Highlands of Scotland as a dye-stuff, and is so called from abounding on rocks in alpine districts.

Rock-oil (rok'oil), n. Petroleum (which see).

Rock-pigeon (rok'pī-on), n. A pigeon that builds her nest in rocky hollows, clefts, or caverns; the Columba livia.

Rock-plant (rok'plant), n. A member of a group of plants which are distinguished by growing on or among naked rocks, and are confined to no particular region or latitude. A large number of the cryptogamia, especially mosses and lichens, belong to this class.

Rock-rabbit (rok'rab-bit), n. A curious genus (Hyrax) of little rabbit-like animals inhabiting rocky and mountainous districts in South Africa and Syria, really akin to the rhinoceros. The Syrian species is the 'coney' of Scripture. See HYRAX, HYRACOIDEA.

Rock-ribbed (rok'ribd), a. Having ribs of rock.

The hills,
Rock-ribbed, and ancient as the sun. Bryant.

Rock-rose (rok'rōz), n. 1. A plant of the genus Helianthemum (which see). — 2. A plant of the genus Cistus, found on the coasts of the Mediterranean in both Europe and Africa. C. creticus (the Cretan rock-rose) affords the fragrant gum known as ladanum or labdanum.

Rock-ruby (rok'rū-bi), n. A name sometimes given to the garnet when it is of a strong but not a deep red, and has a cast of blue.

Rock-salt (rok'salt), n. Mineral salt; common salt found in masses or beds in the new red sandstone, as in Cheshire and elsewhere. Hexahedral rock-salt occurs foliated and fibrous. (See SALT.) In America this name is sometimes given to salt in large crystals formed by evaporation from sea-water, in large basins or cavities.

Rock-sapphire (rok'sam-fir), n. A plant, Crithmum maritimum. See SAMPHIRE.

Rock-serpent (rok'sér-pent), n. See BUNGARUS and ROCK-SNAKE.

Rock-shaft (rok'shaft), n. In steam-engines, a shaft that oscillates or rocks on its journals instead of revolving; specifically, a vibrating shaft with levers on it which works the slide-valves of some engines. This mode was generally adopted before the introduction of the direct-action mode of working them.

Rock-shell (rok'shel), n. A certain univalve characterized by the long straight canal which terminates the mouth of the shell. They belong to the genus Purpura. The common rock-shell is P. lapillus.

Rock-slatér (rok'slät-ér), n. A crustacean of the genus Ligia, belonging to the cursorial section of the order Isopoda, and found on almost all coasts.

Rock-snake (rok'snāk), n. A large snake of the genus Python (P. molurus), one of the Old World representatives of the New World boa constrictor. It is a native of Hindustan, Java, and other parts of Asia.

Rock-soap (rok'sōp), n. A mineral of a pitch-black or bluish-black colour, having a somewhat greasy feel and adhering strongly to the tongue, used for crayons and for washing cloth. It is a hydrated silicate of alumina, resembling bole, and occurs in the igneous rocks of Skye and Antrim, and in various places on the Continent.

Rock-staff (rok'staf), n. The lever of a forge bellows or other vibrating bar in a machine.

Rock-tar (rok'tār), n. Rock-oil; petroleum.

Rock-temple (rok'tem-pl), n. A temple cut out of the solid rock, as at Ellora and other places in Hindustan.

Rock-wood (rok'wūd), n. Ligniform asbestos. It is of a brown colour, and in its general appearance greatly resembles fossil wood.

Rock-work (rok'wérk), n. 1. Stones fixed in mortar in imitation of the asperities of rocks, forming a mound or wall. — 2. A rocky; a design formed of fragments of rocks or large stones in gardens or pleasure-grounds.

Rock-works for effect of character require more consideration than most gardeners are aware of. London.

3. A natural wall or mass of rock.

Rocky (rok'ī), a. 1. Full of or abounding in rocks; as, a rocky mountain; a rocky shore. 'The cold north and rocky regions.' Waller. — 2. Resembling a rock; hence, hard; stony; obstructive; insusceptible of impression; hard as a rock; as, a rocky bosom. 'The oaky, rocky, flinty hearts of men.' Bp. Hall.

Such destruction to withstand
He hasted, and opposed the rocky orb
Of tenfold adamant, his ample shield. Milton.

Rococo (ro-kō'kō), n. [Fr., according to Littré from rocaille, rock-work, from rock-work being a character of the style.] A debased variety of the Louis-Quatorze style of ornament, proceeding from it through the degeneracy of the Louis-Quinze. It is generally a meaningless assemblage of scrolls and crimped conventional shell-work, wrought into all sorts of irregular and indescribable forms, without individuality and without expression. The term is also sometimes applied in contempt to anything bad or tasteless in decorative art.

Rocou (rō'kō), n. Same as Roucou.

Roceta (rok'ta), n. A mediæval musical instrument much used by the minstrels and troubadours of the thirteenth century. It was somewhat like the modern violin. Rev. Orby Shipley.

Rod (rod), n. [A. Sax. ród, a rod or beam, a rod or cross; D. roede, L.G. rood, rode, G. ruthe, rod; allied to L. rudis, a wand, from same root as Skr. ridh, to grow. Rood is a form of this word.] 1. A shoot or slender stem of any woody plant, more especially when cut off and stripped of leaves or twigs; a wand; a straight slender stick; a cane. Hence, (a) an instrument of punishment or correction; chastisement.

A light to guide, a rod

To check the erring, and reprove. Wordsworth.

—To kiss the rod, to show submission after punishment. (b) A kind of sceptre or badge of office; as, the usher's rod; the lord high steward's rod. 'The rod and bird of peace.' Shak.

Hands that the rod of empire might have sway'd. Gray.

(c) A wand or long slender stick, or two or more long sticks joined end on end, for fishing; a fishing-rod. (d) An instrument for measuring. (e) An enchanter's wand, or a wand possessing the power of enchantment.

Ye should have snatched his wand,
And bound him fast: without his rod reversed,
And backward mutterings of dissembling power,
We cannot free the lady. Milton.

2. A measure of length containing 5½ yards, or 16½ feet, more usually termed a Pole or Perch. A square rod is the usual measure of brick-work, and is equal to 272½ square feet. — 3. A shoot or branch of a family; a tribe or race. Ps. lxxiv. 2.

Rod-coupling (rod'kup-ling), n. A coupling, clasp, or other device for uniting the rods which carry the tools used in boring artesian or oil wells, &c.

Roddy (rod'ī), a. Full of rods or twigs. [Rare.]

Rode (rōd), pret. of ride.

Rode, n. A raid; a foray. Spenser.

Rode, n. The cross; the rood. Also called Rode-beam and Rode-tree. Chaucer.

Rode, n. [A. Sax. rudu, redness; comp. ruddy.] Redness; complexion. Chaucer.

Rodent (rō'dent), a. [L. rodens, rodentis, ppr. of rodo, to gnaw.] Gnawing; belonging or pertaining to the order Rodentia.

Rodent (rō'dent), n. An animal that gnaws;

an animal belonging to the order Rodentia.

Rodentia (rō-den'tshi-a), n. pl. [See RODENT, a.] An order (the Glires of Linnaeus) of mammals containing many genera, some of which Rodentia.—Skull of Arctomys (Marmot).

†, Incisors. ♀, Premolars. m, Molars.

are familiar to us, as the squirrel, rat, mouse, hare, rabbit, beaver, &c. They nibble and gnaw their food (hence the name), and are specially characterized by the possession of a single pair of chisel-like cutting teeth in each jaw, between which and the grinding or molar teeth there is a wide gap.

Rod-iron (rod'ī-ern), n. Rolled round iron for nails, fences, &c.

Rodiya (rod'ī-ya), n. One of a degraded race in Ceylon, living in a more abject state than the Pariahs of India, being considered disqualified even for labour. Under the British rule their condition has been improved.

Rodomel (rod'ō-mel), n. [Gr. rodon, a rose, and meli, honey.] The juice of roses mixed with honey. Simmonds.

Rodomonte (rod'ō-mont), n. [Fr. rodomonte, from It. rodomonte, a bully, from Rodomonte, the name of the brave but somewhat boastful leader of the Saracens against Charlemagne, in Ariosto's Orlando Furioso. In Bolardo's Orlando Innamorato, which preceded Ariosto's poem, the name is written Rodamonte, being from Prov. It. rodare, for rotare, from L. rota, a wheel, and monte, L. mons, a mountain, and signifying one who rolls away mountains.] A vain boaster; a braggart; a bombastic fellow; a bully. Sir T. Herbert.

Rodomont (rod'ō-mont), a. Braggart; vainly boasting. 'In his rodomont fashion.' B. Jonson.

Rodomontade (rod'ō-mon-tād'), n. [Fr.; It. rodomontata. See RODOMONT.] Vain boasting; empty bluster or vaunting; rant.

I could show that the rodomontades of Almanzor are neither so irrational nor impossible. Dryden.

Rodomontade (rod'ō-mon-tād'), v. i. To boast; to brag; to bluster; to rant.

Rodomontadist (rod'ō-mon-tād'ist), n. A blustering boaster; one that brags or vaunts. E. Terry.

Rodomontado (rod'ō-mon-tā'dō), n. Rodomontade.

I was a little moved in my nature to hear his rodomontades. Bean, & Fl.

Rodomontador (rod'ō-mon-tā'dor), n. Same as Rodomontadist.

Rody, a. Ruddy. Chaucer.

Roe (rō), n. [See ROEBUCK.] 1. A roebuck. 2. The female of the hart.

Roe (rō), n. [Sw. rog, Dan. rogn, Icel. hrogn, G. rogen, roe, spawn; Sc. ran, ravn, the female roe.] 1. The sperm or spawn of fishes. The debased style of architecture and ornament that prevailed in the later Roman empire, and the styles that proceeded from it, known as Byzantine, Lombard, &c. See under the adjective.—2. The common dialect of Languedoc and some other districts in the south of France.

Romanesque (rô-man-esk'), a. 1. A term applied to the dialect of Languedoc. See the noun.—2. In the fine arts, representing the fantastic and imaginary; or, as more commonly used, belonging to or designating a style of architecture and ornament prevalent during the later Roman empire.—Romanesque architecture, a general and rather vague term applied to the styles of architecture which prevailed from the fifth to the twelfth century. The Romanesque is separated into two divisions, that are very distinct: (a) The debased Roman, in use from the fifth to the eleventh century, including the Byzantine modifications of the Roman; and (b) the late or Gothic Romanesque of the eleventh and twelfth centuries, which comprises the later Byzantine and the Lombard, Rhinish, Saxon, and Norman styles. The former is characterized by a pretty close imitation of the features of Roman, with changes in the mode of their application and distribution; the latter, while based on Roman form, is Gothic in spirit, has a predominance of vertical lines, and introduces various new features and others greatly modified in style. The semicircular arch is used throughout the entire period.

Romantic (rô-man'tik), a. 1. Pertaining to the Romance languages or dialects, or to the races or nations speaking any of the Romance tongues; Romance. See ROMANCE, a.—2. Being in or derived from the Roman alphabet.

Romanti (rô-mant' or rô-mant'), n. A romance; a romance.

Or else some romant unto us areed.

By former shepherds taught thee in thy youth,
Of noble lords' and ladies gentle deed. Dryden.

Romantic (rô-man'tik), a. [Fr. romantique. See ROMANCE.] 1. Pertaining to romance or resembling it; partaking of romance or the marvellous, fanciful, imaginative, or ideal; pertaining to an ideal state of things; wild; fanciful; extravagant; as, romantic notions; romantic expectations; romantic zeal.

Whether the charmer sinner it, or saint it,
If folly grow romantic, I must paint it. Pope.

A romantic scheme is one which is wild, impracticable, and yet contains something which captivates the young. Whately.

2. Pertaining to romances or the popular literature of the middle ages; hence, fictitious; improbable; chimerical. 'Their feigned and romantic heroes.' Dr. J. Scott.

I speak especially of that imagination which is most free, such as we use in romantic inventions, or such as accompany the more severe meditations and disquisitions in philosophy or any other intellectual entertainments. Dr. H. More.

—Romantic school, a name assumed about the beginning of the nineteenth century by a number of young poets and critics in Germany, the Schlegels, Novalis, Tieck, &c., whose efforts were directed to the overthrow of the artificial rhetoric and unimaginative pedantry of the French school of poetry. The name is also given to a similar school which arose in France between twenty and thirty years later, and which had a long struggle for supremacy with the older classic school; Victor Hugo, Lamartine, &c., were the leaders.—8. Wildly picturesque; having striking natural features; full of wild or fantastic scenery; as, a romantic prospect or landscape; a romantic situation.—Romantic, Sentimental. Sentimental is used in relation to the feelings; romantic, to the imagination. A sentimental person is given to displays of exaggerated feeling; a romantic person indulges his imagination in the creation and contemplation of scenes of ideal enjoyment, enterprise, and adventure. Sentimentality is the characteristic of the weaker mind; romance is proper to youth when the imagination is vivid and the temperament enthusiastic.

Romantic (rô-man'tik-al), a. Same as Romantic. [Rare.]

But whosoever had the least sagacity in him could not but perceive that this theology of Epicurus was but romantic. Cudworth.

Rompu (rom'pü), a. [Fr. rompu, pp. of rompre, L. rompere, to break.] In her said of an ordinary when broken, parted asunder, or fracted, as a chevron or bend rompu.

Rondache (roh-dash), n.

[Fr.] A kind of circular shield for foot-soldiers, formerly in use on the Continent.

Ronde (rohnd), n. [Fr.] In typog. a kind of round cursive character, in imitation of French writing, similar to our old chancery engrossing character; round script type.

Rondeau (ron'dô), n. [Fr. rondau, ô. Fr. rondel, from rond, round.] 1. A poem or piece of verse commonly consisting of thirteen lines, of which eight have one rhyme and five another, or it may have only ten lines with two rhymes. It is divided into three strophes, and at the end of the second and third is an unrhymed refrain. The terms rondo and rondel are similarly used, but the latter is said to be more strictly applied to a poem of thirteen lines, certain of which (the first or first two) are repeated.

This sort of writing called the rondau is what I never knew practised in our nation. Pope.

2. A piece of music, vocal or instrumental, generally consisting of three strains, the first of which closes in the original key, while each of the others is so constructed in modulation as to reconduct the ear in an easy and natural manner to the first strain. 3. A kind of jig or lively tune that ends with the first strain repeated.

'Aroint thee witch!' the rump-fed ronyon cries. Shak.

Ront (runt), n. An animal stunted in its growth; a runt. Spenser.

Rood (röd), n. [The same word as rod, in the sense of a land-measure, from the stick used in measuring; comp. D. roede, G. ruthe, a rod or switch and a measure of length. In the sense of a cross, from the rods used to form the crucifixes in churches, which are laid across each other at right angles. See ROD.] 1. A square measure, the fourth part of a statute acre, and equal to 40 square perches or square poles, or 1210 square yards. See ACRE.—2. A measure of 5½ yards in length; a rod, pole, or perch; also, a square pole, or 272¼ square feet, used in estimating mason work.—3. A cross or crucifix; especially, a large crucifix placed at the entrance to the chancel in mediæval churches, often supported on the rood-beam or rood-screen. Sometimes images of the Virgin Mary and St. John were placed, the one on the one side and the other on the other side of the image of Christ, in allusion to John xix. 26.

Yea, by God's rood, I trusted you too much.

Before the first pool, near the wood,

A dead tree in set horror stood,

Peeled and disjointed, stark as rood.

Rood-arch (röd'ärch), n. The arch in a church between the nave and chancel, so called from the rood being placed here.

Rood-beam (röd'bëm), n. A beam across the entrance to the chancel of a church for supporting the rood.

Rood-bok (röd'de-bok), n. [D. rood, red, bok, a buck.] The Natal bush-buck (Cephalopus Natalensis). It is of a deep reddish-brown, stands about 2 feet high, has large ears, and straight, pointed horns about 3 inches long. It is solitary in its habits, and rarely leaves the dense forests except in the evening or during rainy weather.

Rood-free (röd'frë), a. Exempt from punishment. [Rare.]

Rood-loft (röd'loft), n. The gallery in a church where the rood and its appendages were placed. This loft or gallery was commonly placed over the rood-screen in parish churches, or between the nave and chancel. The front of this loft, like the screen below, was usually richly ornamented with tracery and carvings, either in wood or in stone. It was approached by a small staircase in the wall of the building.

Rood-screen (röd'skrën), n. A screen or ornamental partition separating the choir of a church from the nave, and often supporting the rood or crucifix.

Rood-tower, Rood-steeple (röd'tou-ér, röd'sté'pl), n. The tower or steeple built over the intersection of a cruciform church.

Rood-tree (röd'trë), n. The cross. 'Died upon the rood-tree.' Gower.

Roody (röd'i), a. Rank in growth; coarse; luxurious. [Provincial.]

Roof (röf), n. [A. Sax. hröf, a roof; cog. O. Fris. hröf, a top, a roof; Icel. hröf, a shed under which ships are built; räf, räfr, a roof; D. roef, a cover, a cabin.] 1. The cover of any house or building, irrespective first, the king-post principal, and the second, the queen-post principal, with the purlins and common rafters in situ. The mode of framing here exhibited is termed a truss.

Sometimes, when the width of the building is not great, common rafters are used alone to support the roof. They are in that case joined together in pairs, nailed where they meet at top, and connected with a tie at the bottom. They are then termed couples, a pair forming a couple close.—2. That which corresponds with or resembles the covering of a house, as the arch or top of a furnace or oven, the top of a carriage, coach, car, &c.; an arch, or the interior of a vault; hence, a canopy or the like; as, the roof of heaven.

On their naked limbs the flowery roof
Shower'd roses. Milton.

Rooflet (röf'let), n. A small roof or covering.

Roof-tree (röf'trë), n. 1. The beam in the angle of a roof. Hence—2. The roof itself.

A long farewell to Locksley Hall!

Now for me the woods may wither, now for me the roof-tree fall. Tennyson.

—To your roof-tree, in Scotland, a toast expressive of a wish for prosperity to one's family, because the roof-tree covers the house and all in it.

As we say among familiar acquaintance, 'To your Fire-side,' he (the Highlander) says much to the same purpose, 'To your Roof-tree,' alluding to the family's safety from tempests. Burt.

Roofy (röf'i), a. Having roofs.

Whether to roofy houses they repair,

Or sun themselves abroad in open air. Dryden.

Rook (rök), n. [A. Sax. hrök, D. roek, L. rook, Icel. hrökr, Sw. roka, O.H.G. Irroch, Prov. G. roche—all names derived from the cry which the bird utters, like crow and raven. Comp. Gael. roc, to croak, rocas, a rook, and L. ravicus, hoarse.] 1. A bird of the genus Corvus (C. frugilegus). This bird resembles the crow, but differs from it in not feeding on carrion, but on insects and grain. In crows, also, the nostrils and roof of the bill are clothed with feathers, but in rooks the same parts are naked, or have only a few bristly hairs. The rook is content with feeding on the insect tribe (particularly the larvae of the cockchafer) and on grain; and there can be no doubt that it amply repays the farmer for the seed it takes, by its assiduity in clearing the land of wire-worms and the destructive grub. Rooks are gregarious at all seasons, resorting constantly to the same trees every spring to breed, when the nests may be seen upon the upper branches. They are spread over the greater part of Europe, but nowhere do they seem to be more abundant than in Great Britain and Ireland.—2. A cheat; a trickish rapacious fellow; one who practises the plucking of pigeons. (See PIGEON.) 'Tormentors, rooks, and rakeshames, sold to lucre.' Milton.

Rook (rök), v.i. To cheat; to defraud. 'A band of rooking officials.' Milton.

Rook (rök), n. [Fr. roc, It. rocco, Sp. roque, from Per. and Ar. rokh, the rook or castle at chess.] In chess, one of the four pieces placed on the corner squares of the board: also called a Castle. The rook moves the whole extent of the board, in lines parallel to its sides, unless impeded by some other piece.

Rook (rök), v.i. To squat or sit close; to ruck.

The raven rook'd her in the chimney's top. Shak.

Rookery (rök'ér-i), n. 1. A wood, &c., used for nesting-places by rooks. The term is also applied in an extended sense to rocks and islets frequented by sea-birds for laying their eggs, and to a resort for seals for breeding purposes.—2. The rocks belonging to a rookery. 'The many-winter'd crow that leads the clanging rookery home.' Tennyson. 3. A brothel. [Slang.]—4. A close assemblage of poor mean buildings inhabited by the lowest class; a resort of thieves, sharpers, &c.

That classical spot adjoining the brewery at the bottom of Tottenham-Court-Road, best known to the initiated as the Rookery. Dickens.

That part of a plant which enters and fixes itself in the earth, or, in the case of parasites, to other plants, and serves to support the plant, while by means of its radicles it imbibes nutriment for the stem, branches, leaves, and fruit. There are six distinct organs which are capable of entering into the composition of a root, viz. the radicle, the fibris, the soteles, the bulb, the tuber, and the rhizome. Roots receive different names according to their structure, forms, and positions, as branched, bulbiferous, fibrous, horizontal, oblique, simple, tapering, vertical, &c.—Aerial roots, (a) small roots shooting from the stem of a plant and attaching themselves to the bark of trees; the roots of parasitic plants or epiphytes. (b) Large roots growing from the stem which descend and establish themselves in the soil.—2. That which resembles a root in position or function; the part of anything that resembles the roots of a plant in manner of growth, or as a source of nourishment, support, or origin; as, the roots of a cancer, of teeth, &c. Hence, (a) the bottom or lower part of anything. 'Deep to the roots of hell.' Milton.

He putteth forth his hand upon the rock; he overturneth the mountains by the roots. Job xxviii. 9.

(b) The origin or cause of anything. The love of money is the root of all evil. 1 Tim. vi. 10.

(c) An elementary notional syllable; that part of a word which conveys its essential meaning, as distinguished from the formative parts by which this meaning is modified; thus, true may be regarded as the root of un-true-th-ful-ness. (d) The first ancestor. 'The root and father of many kings.' Shak.

They were the roots out of which sprung two distinct people. Locke.

(e) In math. the root of any quantity is such a quantity as, when multiplied into itself a certain number of times, will exactly produce that quantity. Thus 2 is a root of 4, because when multiplied into itself it exactly produces 4. The power is named from the number of the factors employed in the multiplication, and the root is named from the power. Thus if a quantity be multiplied once by itself the product is called the second power or square, and the quantity itself the square root, or second root of the product; if the quantity be multiplied twice by itself we obtain the third power or cube, and the quantity is the cube root or third root; and so on. The character marking a root is $\sqrt{\quad}$, and the particular root is indicated by placing above the sign the figure which expresses the number of the root, which figure is called the index of the root. Thus $\sqrt[4]{16}$ indicates the fourth root of 16, that is 2; $\sqrt[4]{4}$ the square root of 4, that is 2, the index in the case of the square root being usually omitted. The same is the case with algebraic quantities, as $\sqrt[3]{a^3+3a^2b+3ab^2+b^3} = a+b$. See POWER, INDEX, INVOLUTION, EVOLUTION. (f) In music, (1) a note which, besides its own sound, generates overtones or harmonics; (2) that note from among whose overtones any chord may be selected; (3) a note upon which, whether expressed or implied, a chord is built up; the fundamental note of a chord. (g) In old astron. any certain time taken at pleasure, from which, as an era, the celestial motions were to be computed.—3. An esculent root; a plant whose root, or whose bulbs or tubers are esculent, or the most useful part, as beets, carrots, &c.—To take root, or to strike root, to become planted or fixed, or to be established; to increase and spread.

That love took deepest root which first did grow. Dryden. When the soil is so well prepared for its reception science will strike its root deep. Brougham.

Root (rōt), v.i. 1. To fix the root; to enter the earth, as roots.

In deep grounds the weeds root the deeper. Mortimer.

2. To be firmly fixed; to be established.

If any error chanced . . . to cause misapprehensions, he gave them not leave to root and fasten by concealment. Bp. Fell.

Root (rōt), v.t. 1. To fix by the root; to plant and fix deep in the earth; as, a tree roots itself; a deeply rooted tree.—2. To plant deeply; to impress deeply and durably; to use chiefly in the participle.

Canst thou not minister to a mind diseas'd, Pluck from the memory a rooted sorrow. Shak.

The Presbyterians could never have been perfectly reconciled to the father: they had no such rooted enmity to the son. Macaulay.

Root (rōt), v.t. [Formerly also written urot, root, from A. Sax. urōtan, urōtan, to root up; D. uroeten, Icel. róta, Dan. rode, to root up, as with the snout; A. Sax. urōt, O. Fris. urote, a snout.] 1. To dig or burrow in with the snout; to turn up with the snout, as a swine. '(The boar) would root these beauties as he roots the mead.' Shak.—2. To tear up or out as if by rooting; to eradicate; to extirpate; to remove or destroy utterly; to exterminate; generally with up, out, away, &c. 'To root out the whole hated family.' Shak. 'Not to destroy but root them out of heaven.' Milton.

He's a rank weed, Sir Thomas, And we must root him out. Shak.

In vain we plant, we build, our stores increase, If conscience roots up all our inward peace. Glanville.

[The use of this word has no doubt been influenced by the entirely different word root.]

Root (rōt), v.i. To turn up the earth with the snout, as swine.

Wild dogs, and wolf, and boar, and bear, Came night and day, and rooted in the ground. Tennyson.

Root-bound (rōt'bound), a. Fixed to the earth by roots; firmly fixed, as if by the root; immovable. 'Or, as Daphne was, root-bound, that fed Apollo.' Milton.

Root-breaker, Root-bruiser (rōt'brāk-ēr, rōt'brōz-ēr), n. A machine for breaking or bruising potatoes, turnips, carrots, or other raw roots, into small or moderately-sized pieces, before giving them to cattle or horses.

Root-built (rōt'bilt), a. Built of roots. 'The root-built cell.' Shenstone.

Root-crop (rōt'krop), n. A crop of plants with esculent roots, especially of plants having single roots, as turnips, beets, &c.

Root-eater (rōt'ēt-ēr), n. An animal that feeds on roots.

Rootedly (rüt'ed-li), adv. In a rooted manner; deeply; from the heart.

They all do hate him
As rootedly as I. Shak.

Rootedness (rüt'ed-nes), n. The state or condition of being rooted.

Rooter (rüt'ér), n. One that roots; one that tears up by the roots; one who eradicates or destroys. 'When the rooters and thorough reformers made clean work with the church, and took away all.' South.

Rootery (rüt'ér-i), n. A mound or pile formed with the roots of trees, in which plants are set as in a rockery, used as an ornamental object in gardening.

Root-hair (rüt'här), n. In bot. a slender hair-like fibre growing on roots, being a production of the epidermis of the root.

Root-house (rüt'hous), n. 1. A house made of roots.—2. A house for storing up or depositing potatoes, turnips, carrots, cabbages, or other roots or tops, for the winter feed of cattle.

Root-leaf (rüt'lēf), n. A leaf growing immediately from the root.

Rootless (rüt'les), a. Having no root. 'A rootless tree.' Sir T. More.

Rootlet (rüt'let), n. A radicle; a little root.

Root-mildew (rüt'mil-dū), n. The name given to certain mycelia which infest the roots of peaches, apples, currants, roses, &c., causing their death.

Root-parasite (rüt'par-a-sit), n. A plant which grows upon the root of another plant, as plants of the nat. order Orobanchaceae, or broom-rapes.

Root-stock (rüt'stok), n. In bot. a prostrate rooting thickened stem, which yearly produces young branches or plants; a rhizome. Ginger and orris roots are common instances of it.

Rooty (rüt'i), a. Full of roots; as, rooty ground. Chapman.

Rooye-bok (rö'ye-bok), n. [D. rooijen, to regulate, to order, and bok, buck—from their habit of walking straight forward in single file.] A handsome antelope of South Africa, Eupyceros melampus, measuring 3 feet in height, and having elegantly shaped ringed horns and a beautiful tinted bay coat. A black semicircular mark on the croup, and the jet black hue of the black of its feet, afford easy means of distinguishing it from other antelopes. Called also Pallah.

Ropalac (rô-pal'ik), a. [Gr. rhopalos, a club.] 1. Club-formed; increasing or swelling toward the end.—2. Relating to poetical verses in which the words succeed each other in a regularly increasing number of syllables.

Rope (rôp), n. [Formerly also roop, rop, rape; A. Sax. râp, Sc. raip, Icel. reip, D. reep, roop, G. reif, Goth. raipe.] 1. A cord of some thickness; a general name applied to cordage over 1 inch in circumference. Ropes are usually made of hemp, flax, cotton, coir, or other vegetable fibre, or of iron, steel, or other metallic wire. A hempen rope is composed of a certain number of yarns or threads which are first spun or twisted into strands, and the finished rope goes under special names according to the number and arrangement of the strands of which it is composed. A hawser-laid rope is composed of three strands twisted left-hand, the yarn being laid up right-hand. A cable-laid rope consists of three strands of hawser-laid rope twisted right-hand; called also water-laid, or right-hand rope. A shroud-laid rope consists of a central strand slightly twisted, and three strands twisted around it; called also four-strand rope. A flat rope usually consists of a series of hawser-laid ropes placed side by side and fastened together by sewing in a zigzag direction. Wire ropes generally consist of six strands laid or spun around a hempen core, each strand consisting of six wires laid the contrary way around a smaller hempen core.—2. A row or string consisting of a number of things united; as, a rope of onions; a rope of pearls.—Rope's end, the end of a rope; a short piece of rope, often used as an instrument of punishment.—Rope of sand, proverbially, a feeble union or tie; a band easily broken.—Upon the high ropes, (a) elated; in high spirits. (b) Haughty; arrogant. Swift.—To give a person rope, to let him go on without check.

Rope (rôp), v.t. pret. & pp. roped; ppr. roping. To be drawn out or extended into a filament or thread by means of any glutinous or adhesive quality.

Such bodies partly follow the touch of another body, and partly stick to themselves, and therefore rope and draw themselves in threads, as pitch, glue, and birdlime. Bacon.

Rope (rôp), v.t. 1. To draw by or as by a rope; to fasten or tie up with a rope or ropes; as, to rope a bale of goods.—2. To pull or curb in; to restrain, as a horse by its rider to prevent it winning a race; a not uncommon trick on the turf.

The bold yeomen, in full confidence that their favourite will not be roped, back their opinions manfully for crows. Lawrence.

Rope-band (rôp'band), See ROBBIN.

Rope-bark (rôp'bark), n. A shrub (Dirca palustris) growing in low wet places, as boggy woods, in the United States. Called otherwise Swamp-wood, Leather-wood, Moose-wood.

Rope-dancer (rôp'dans-ér), n. One who walks, dances, or performs acrobatic feats on a rope extended at a greater or less height above the floor or ground. 'A daring rope-dancer, whom they expect to fall every moment.' Addison.

Rope-dancing (rôp'dans-ing), n. The act or profession of a rope-dancer. Arbutnot.

Rope-ladder (rôp'lād-ér), n. A ladder made of ropes.

Rope-maker (rôp'māk-ér), n. One whose occupation is to make ropes or cordage.

Rope-making (rôp'māk-ing), n. The art or business of manufacturing ropes or cordage.

Rope-mat (rôp'mat), n. A mat made of oakum.

Ropen, † pp. of repe or reap. Reaped. Chaucer.

Rope-porter (rôp'pört-ér), n. A pulley mounted on a frame, over which the ropes of steam-ploughs are borne off the ground so as to prevent wear and tear from friction.

Rope-pump (rôp'pump), n. A machine for raising water, consisting of an endless rope or ropes passing over a pulley fixed at the place to which the water is to be raised, and under another pulley fixed below the surface of the water. The upper pulley being turned rapidly by a winch, motion is given to the rope, and the water rises up along with the ascending part of the rope, partly by the momentum it acquires when in motion, and partly by capillary attraction.

Roper (rôp'ér), n. 1. A rope-maker.—2. One who ropes goods; a packer.

Rope-ripe (rôp'rip), a. Fit for hanging; deserving a rope.

Lord, how you roll in your rope-ripe terms! Chapman.

Ropery (rôp'ér-i), n. 1. A place where ropes are made.—2. † Conduct that deserves the halter.

What saucy merchant was this, that was so full of his ropery? Shak.

Rope's-end (rôp's-end), v.t. To punish by thrashing with a rope's end; as, to rope's-end a juvenile trespasser on board a vessel.

Rope-shaped (rôp'shap't), a. A term applied to roots, as those of certain of the screw-pines, which are formed of coarse fibre resembling cords.

Rope-spinner (rôp'spin-ér), n. One that spins or makes ropes.

Rope-spinning (rôp'spin-ing), n. The operation of spinning or twisting ropes.

Rope-trick (rôp'trik), n. 1. † A trick that deserves the halter.

She may perhaps call him half a score knaves or so; an he'll begin once, he'll rail in his rope-tricks. Shak.

2. A trick performed with ropes.

Rope-walk (rôp'wak), n. A long covered walk, or a long building over smooth ground where ropes are manufactured.

Rope-walker (rôp'wak-ér), n. Same as Rope-dancer.

Rope-yarn (rôp'yärn), n. Yarn for ropes, consisting of a single thread. The threads are twisted into strands, and the strands into ropes.

Ropily (rôp'i-li), adv. In a ropy or viscous manner, so as to be capable of being drawn out like a rope.

Ropiness (rôp'i-nes), n. The state or quality of being ropy; stringiness or aptness to draw out in a string or thread without breaking, as of glutinous substances; viscosity; adhesiveness.

Ropish (rôp'ish), a. Tending to ropiness; ropy.

Ropy (rôp'i), a. 1. Resembling a rope or cord; cord-like. [Rare.]

In vain
Their lax'd and ropy sinews sorely strain
Heap'd loads to draw. J. Baillie.

2. Capable of being drawn into a thread, as a glutinous substance; stringy; viscous; tenacious; glutinous; as, ropy wine; ropy lees. Wine is called ropy when it shows a milky or flaky sediment and an oily appearance when poured out.

Roque-laure (rô'ke-lôr), n. [From the Duke de Roque-laure.] A kind of short cloak much used in the earlier portion of the eighteenth century. Gay.

Roque-laure, time of George II.

Roque-lo (rô'ke-lô), n. Same as Roque-laure.

Roquet (rô'kâ), v.t. and i. In the game of croquet, for the player to cause his own ball to strike another ball.

Roral (rô'ral), a. [L. roralis, from ros, roris, dew.] Pertaining to dew or consisting of dew; dewy.

These see her from the dusky plight, . . .
With roral wash redeem her face. Green.

Roration (rô-râ'shon), n. [L. roratio, rorationis, from ros, roris, dew.] A falling of dew.

Roric (rô'rik), a. [L. ros, roris, dew.] Pertaining to or resembling dew; dewy; specifically applied to certain curious figures or appearances seen on polished solid surfaces after breathing on them; also, to a class of related phenomena produced under very various conditions, but agreeing in being considered as the effect of either light, heat, or electricity.

Rorid (rô'rid), a. [L. roridus, from ros, roris, dew.] Dewy. 'Rorid drops of balsam to heal the wounded.' Dr. H. More.

Roriferous (rô-rif-er-us), a. [L. ros, roris, dew, and fero, to produce.] 1. Generating or producing dew.—2. In physiol. a term applied to such vessels as give out fluids like dew on the surface of organs.

Rorifluent (rô-rif-lu-ent), a. [L. ros, roris, dew, and fluo, to flow.] Flowing with dew.

Rorqual (rôrk'wal), n. [Dan. rôrqual, from rôr, a reed, a tube (alluding to the folds below the jaw), and hval, whale; comp., however, N. royr-hval, a whale, according to Vigfusson so called from its reddish colour.] A cetaceous mammal of the genus Balenoptera, closely allied to the common whales, but distinguished by having a dorsal fin, with the throat and under parts wrinkled with deep longitudinal folds, which are supposed to be susceptible of great dilatation, but the use of which is as Great Northern Rorqual (Rorqualus or Balenoptera borealis).

yet unknown. Two or three species are known, but they are rather avoided on account of their ferocity, the shortness and coarseness of their baleen or whalebone, and the small quantity of oil they produce. The northern rorqual attains a great size, being found from 80 to over 100 feet in length. Naturalists are, however, not agreed as to the number of species in the genus, some asserting that a genus Rorqualus or Physalus exists, completely distinct from Balanoptera, and containing the largest members, while Balanoptera contains only those species which do not exceed 25 feet in length, and which are known as pike whales, from the resemblance of the mouth to that of the pike; others hold that the latter are merely the young of the great northern rorqual. The rorqual feeds on cod, herring, pilchards, and other fish, in pursuing which it is not seldom stranded on the British shores.

Rorulent† (rō'rū-lent), a. [L. rorulentus, from ros, roris, dew.] Full of dew.

Rory† (rō'ri), a. [L. ros, roris, dew.] Dewy.

On Libanon at first his foot he set,
And shook his wings with rory May-dew wet.

Fairfax.

Rosa (rō'za), n. The name of the most universally admired and cultivated genus of plants, forming the type of the nat. order Rosaceæ. See ROSE.

Rosace (rōz'-ās), n. [Fr.] An ornamental piece of plaster-work in the centre of a ceiling, in which a lustre or chandelier is placed.

Rosaceæ (rōz'-ā-sē-ē), n. pl. A large and important order of plants, of which the rose is the type, distinguished by having several petals, separate carpels, distinct perigynous, numerous stamens, alternate leaves, and an exogenous mode of growth. The species are, for the most part, inhabitants of the cooler parts of the world. They are in some cases trees, in other shrubs, and in a great number of instances herbaceous perennial plants; scarcely any are annuals. The apple, pear, plum, cherry, peach, almond, nectarine, apricot, strawberry, raspberry, and similar valuable fruits, are the produce of the order. Some of the species are also important as medicinal plants, as the root of Tormentilla reptans, Geum urbanum, and others, which contain an astringent principle. The genera of this order have been divided into four principal groups or sub-orders, viz. Rosæ, including the true roses, potentillas, spiræas, and neuradas; Pomeæ, including the apple, pear, medlar, quince, service, and mountain ash; Amygdaleæ, or the almond tribe; and Sanguisorbeæ, or burnet tribe.

Rosaceus (rōz'-ā-shus), a. [L. rosaceus. See ROSE.] 1. Rose-like; composed of several petals arranged in a circular form; as, a rosaceus corolla.—2. Of or pertaining to the nat. order Rosaceæ.

Rosal† (rō'zal), a. 1. Rosy.—2. Rosaceous.

Rosalia (rōz'-ā-lī-ā), n. [It.] In music, a species of imitation, consisting of the repetition of a phrase or passage, the pitch of which is raised a tone or semitone at each repetition.

Rosalina (rōz'-ā-lī-nā), n. [From L. rosa, a rose.] The name given to a fossil genus of many-chambered Foraminifera, from the cells being disposed in a circular or rose-like form.

Rosaniline (rōz-an'il-in), n. (C₁₅H₁₁N₃). An organic base, a derivative of aniline, crystallizing in white needles, capable of uniting with acids to form salts, which salts form the well-known rosaniline colouring matter of commerce. Silk and wool dipped into aqueous solutions of any of the salts withdraw them from solution and become dyed of a beautiful red colour. Cotton, on the other hand, does not withdraw this colouring matter, but must be first treated with a mordant of some animal substance, such as albumen. Called also Aniline Red, Roseine, Magenta, &c.

Rosarian (rō-zā'ri-an), n. A cultivator of roses; a rose-grower; a rose-fancier. S. R. Hole.

Rosary (rō'za-rī), n. [L. rosarium. See ROSE.] 1. A chaplet; a garland. 'A rosary or chaplet of good works.' Jer. Taylor. The term was formerly often adopted as a title of numerous books, consisting of a garland of flowers, as it were, culled from various authors.—2. A string of beads used by Roman Catholics, on which they count their prayers. There are always in the rosary five or fifteen divisions, each containing ten small beads and one large one; for each of the small beads an Ave Maria, and for each of the larger a Paternoster is repeated.—3. A rose-garden. 'Thick rosaries of scented thorn.' Tennyson.—4. A counterfeit coin of the reign of Edward I. worth about a halfpenny, coined abroad and brought surreptitiously into England. It was so called from bearing the figure of a rose.

Roscid (ros'id), a. [L. roscidus, from ros, dew.] Dewy; containing dew, or consisting of dew. Dr. H. More.

Rose (rōz), n. [A. Sax. rose, Fr. rose; like the name in the other European languages, borrowed from the L. rosa, a rose; allied to Gr. rhodon, a rose, probably from an Eastern source.] 1. A well-known and universally cultivated plant and flower of the genus Rosa, nat. order Rosaceæ. The rose has been a favourite flower from the remotest antiquity, and has been adopted as the national badge of England. It is found in almost every country of the northern hemisphere, both in the Old and the New World. All the species are included between 70° and 18° north latitude. The species as well as the varieties are numerous, and the former exceedingly difficult to distinguish. Some of the species possess medicinal properties. The fruit of R. canina, or dog-rose, and other allied species, is astringent; and the petals of R. gallica, or French rose, are also astringent when dried with rapidity. R. moschata, centifolia, and damascena yield the attar, essence, or oil of roses. Many other perfumes are made from roses, as rose-water, vinegar of roses, spirit of roses, honey of roses, &c. The R. centifolia is the well-known cabbage or Provence rose.—2. A knot of ribbon in the form of a rose, used as an ornamental tie of a hat-band, garter, shoe, &c.—3. Fig. full flush or bloom.

He wears the rose Shak.
Of youth upon him.

4. In arch. a rosette (which see).—5. A perforated nozzle of a pipe, spout, &c., to distribute water in fine shower-like jets; a rose-head; also, a plate similarly perforated covering some aperture.—6. A popular name of the disease erysipelas: from its colour.—7. A circular card or disc, or diagram with radiating lines, as the compass-card or rose of the compass; the barometric rose, which shows the barometric pressure, at any place, in connection with the winds blowing from different points of the compass; a wind-rose.—Wars of the Roses, in Eng. hist. the civil contest between the houses of York and Lancaster, the badge of the former house being a white, of the latter a red rose.—Under the rose, in secret; privately; in a manner that forbids disclosure.—Rose of Jericho, a cruciferous plant (Anastatica hierochuntina), growing in the arid wastes of Arabia and Palestine. It becomes rolled up like a ball in the dry season, and opens its foliage and seed-vessels when it comes in contact with moisture. See cut under ANASTATICA.—The Christmas rose is Helleborus niger.

Rose (rōz), v.t. To render rose-coloured; to redden; to cause to flush or blush. 'A maid yet rosed over with the virgin crimson of modesty.' Shak.

The very name of her white neck
Was rosed with indignation. Tennyson.

Rose (rōz), pret. of rise.

Rose-acacia (rōz-a-kā'shi-a), n. A highly ornamental flowering shrub of the genus Robinia (R. hispida), inhabiting the southern parts of the Alleghany Mountains, and now frequently seen in gardens in Europe.

Roseal† (rōz'-ē-āl), a. [L. roseus, from rosa, a rose.] Like a rose in smell or colour; roseate.

'The rich and roseal spring of those rare sweets.' Crashaw.

Rose-aniline (rōz-an'il-in), n. Same as Rosaniline.

Rose-apple (rōz-ap-lī), n. A tree of the genus Eugenia, the E. Jambos, belonging to the nat. order Myrtaceæ. It is a branching tree, a native of the East Indies. The fruit is about the size of a hen's egg, it is rose-scented, and has the flavour of an apricot. Called also Malabar Plum.

Roseate (rōz'-ē-āt), a. [L. roseus, rōsy.] 1. Full of roses.

Prepare your roseate bowers,
Celestial palms, and ever-blooming flowers. Pope.

2. Of a rose colour; blooming; as, roseate beauty.

Rose-bay (rōz-bā), n. The name of several plants; as, (a) the Nerium Oleander. (b) The dwarf rose-bay, a plant of the genus Rhododendron, having handsome flowers. (c) Epilobium angustifolium.

Rose-beetle, Rose-fly (rōz-bē-tl, rōz'fī), n. A well-known coleopterous insect, the Cetonia aurata, which frequents roses.

Rosebud (rōz'bud), n. The bud of a rose; the flower of the rose just appearing.

Rose-bug (rōz'bug), n. A rose-chaffer. [American.]

Rosebush (rōz'bush), n. The bush, shrub, or plant which bears roses.

Rose-camphor (rōz'kam-fēr), n. One of the two volatile oils composing attar of roses. It is a stearoptene, and is solid.

Rose-campion (rōz'kam-pi-on), n. A plant, the Lychnis coronaria.

Rose-carnation (rōz'kär-nā'shon), n. A carnation the ground colour of whose petals is striped with a rose colour.

And many a rose-carnation feed
With summer spice the humming air. Tennyson.

Rose-chaffer (rōz'chäf-ēr), n. The name commonly given in this country to the rose-beetle or rose-fly. (See ROSE-BEETLE.) The rose-chaffer or rose-bug of the United States is the Macrodactylus subspinosus, a smaller coleopterous insect of the family Melolonthideæ. It feeds on rose-petals, and is a great pest in gardens.

Rose-cold (rōz'kōld), n. Same as Hay-fever.
Rose-colour (rōz'kul-ēr), n. 1. The colour of a rose, or pink. Hence—2. Beauty or attractiveness, as of a rose; often, fancied beauty or attractiveness; couleur-de-rose; as, life appears to the young all rose-colour.

Rose-coloured (rōz'kul-ēr'd), a. 1. Having the colour of a rose.—2. Uncommonly beautiful; hence, extravagantly fine or pleasing; as, rose-coloured views of the future.

Rose-cross† (rōz'kros), n. A Rosicrucian; an empiric.

Rose-cut (rōz'kut), a. A term applied to a gem the back of which is left flat, and the face cut into a series of inclined triangular facets arranged around a central hexagon.

Rose-diamond (rōz'di-a-mōnd), n. A diamond nearly hemispherical, cut into twenty-four triangular planes arranged around a hexagonal centre.

Rose-drop (rōz'drop), n. 1. A lozenge flavoured with rose-essence.—2. An ear-ring.—3. A pimple on the nose caused by drinking ardent spirits; a grog-blossom.

Rose-elder (rōz'el-dēr), n. The gelder-rose (Viburnum Opulus).

Rose-engine (rōz'en-jin), n. An appendage to the turning-lathe, by which a surface of wood or metal, such as a watch-case, is engraved with a variety of curved lines. This mechanism derives its name from the circumstance of the combination of the lines produced by it presenting some resemblance to a full-blown rose.

Rose-faced (rōz'fäst), a. Having a rosy or red face.

Rose-festival (rōz'fes-ti-val), n. A festival celebrated on June 8th, which had its origin at Salency in France. A girl is selected from three most distinguished for female virtues, her name being announced from the pulpit to give an opportunity for objections. She is then conducted to church, where she hears service in a place of honour, after which she formerly used to open a ball with the seigneur. She is called La Rosière, because she is adorned with roses held together by a silver clasp presented by Louis XIII. The festival has been imitated at other places.

Rose-fever (rōz'tē-vēr), n. Same as Hay-fever.

Rose-fish (rōz'fīsh), n. The Norway haddock. Also, a fish found on the eastern coasts of North America. See RED-FISH.

Rose-fly, n. See ROSE-BEETLE.

Rose-gall (rōz'gal), n. An excrescence on the dog-rose.

Rose-head (rōz'hed), n. See ROSE, 5.

Rose-hued (rōz'hüd), a. Of the hue or colour of the rose; rose-coloured. 'Flowing beneath her rose-hued zone.' Tennyson.

Roseine (rōz'ē-in), n. Same as Rosaniline.

Rose-knot (rōz'not), n. An ornamental bunch of ribbons plaited so as to represent a rose.

Rose-lake (rōz'lāk), n. A pigment of a rich tint prepared from lac and madder precipitated on an earthy basis. Called also Rose-madder.

Rose-lathe (rōz'lāth), n. A lathe fitted with a rose-engine. See ROSE-ENGINE.

Rose-lip (rōz'līp), n. A lip of a rosy or red ripe colour. 'Thy rose-lips and full blue eyes.' Tennyson.

Roselite (rōz'līt), n. [In honour of the German naturalist G. Rose.] A native arseniate of cobalt, occurring in small red crystals.

Rosellate (rō-zel'āt), a. [From L. rosa, a rose.] In bot. a term applied to leaves when they are disposed like the petals of a rose.

Roselle (rō-zel'), n. A species of Hibiscus (H. Sabdariffa), the pleasantly acidulous calyxes of which are used in the East and West Indies for tarts, jellies, &c., and for making a cool refreshing drink.

Rose-madder (rôz'mad-ër), n. See ROSE-LAKE.

Rose-mallow (rôz'mal-lô), n. Same as Hollyhock.

Rosemary (rôz'ma-ri), n. [O.E. rosmarine, from L. rosmarinus, rosemary—ros, dew, and marinus, belonging to the sea, from mare, the sea, so named because it is of a dewy nature, and thrives best in places near the sea.] Rosmarinus, a genus of plants belonging to the nat. order Labiate. The R. officinalis is an evergreen shrub, with sessile linear leaves which are hoary beneath, and very pale blue flowers, growing naturally in the southern parts of France, Spain, and Italy, but commonly cultivated in our gardens. It has a fragrant smell, and a warm, pungent, bitterish taste. It yields by distillation a light, pale, essential oil of great fragrance, which is extensively employed in the manufacture of pomatums for the growth of hair.

There's rosemary, that's for remembrance. Shak.
—Wild rosemary is a British plant, Andromeda polifolia.

Rosen† (rôzm), a. Consisting of or resembling roses; rosy. 'A rosen chaplet.' Chaucer.

Rose-nail (rôz'nâl), n. A nail with a conical head which is hammered into triangular facets.

Rose-noble (rôz'nô-bl), n. An ancient English gold coin, stamped with the figure of a rose, first struck in the reign of Edward III., and current at 6s. 8d. Rose-nobles were also coined in the reign of Edward IV. of the value of 8s. 4d.

Roseola (rô-zê-ô-la), n. [From L. rosa, a rose.] In med. a kind of rash or rose-coloured efflorescence, mostly symptomatic, and occurring in connection with different febrile complaints. Called also Rose-rash and Scarlet Rash.

Rose-pink (rôz'pîngk), n. 1. A pigment prepared by dyeing chalk or whitening with a decoction of Brazil-wood and alum.—2. A rosy pink colour or hue.

Rose-quartz (rôz'kwarts), n. A sub-species of quartz, which is rose-red.

Roser,† n. A rose-bush. Chaucer.

Rose-rash (rôz'rash), n. Same as Roseola.

Rose-red (rôz'red), a. Red as a rose. 'Thy rose-red lips.' Tennyson.

Rose-rial (rôz'ri-al), n. [Rose, and rial for royal.] A name for British gold coins of various reigns and various values. The noble of the reign of Edward IV., of the value of 8s. 4d., was so called from the figure of a rose which was added to the reverse. There were rose-rials of James I. of the value of 30s.

Rose-root (rôz'rôt), n. A plant, Rhodiola rosea. See RHODIOLA.

Rosery (rôz-ër-i), n. A place where roses grow; a nursery of rose-bushes; a rosary.

Roset (rôz'et), n. [Fr. rosette, from rose.] A red colour used by painters. See ROSETTE.

Roset (rôz'et), n. Rosin. [Scotch.]

Rosetta Stone (rô-zet'a stôn), n. The name given to a stone in the British museum, originally found by the French near the Rosetta mouth of the Nile. It is a piece of black basalt, and contains part of three distinct inscriptions, the first or highest in hieroglyphics, the second in enchorial characters, and the third in Greek. According to the Greek inscription the stone was erected in the reign of Ptolemy Epiphanes, about 193 years before Christ.

Rosetta-wood (rô-zet'a-wud), n. A handsome furniture wood, of an orange-red colour with very dark veins, imported from the East Indies. It is of durable texture, but the colours become dark by exposure. The tree yielding it is not known.

Rosette (rô-zet'), n. [Fr., a dim. of rose.] 1. An imitation of a rose, as by ribbon, used as an ornament or badge; specifically, in arch. a flower-ornament of frequent use in decorations and in all styles. In Roman architecture rosettes are used to decorate coffers in ceilings, and in the soffits of cornices. They are the central ornament of the abacus of the Corinthian order. In medieval architecture the varieties of this ornament are abundant.—2. A red colour used by painters.

Rosetum (rô-zê-tum), n. [L., from rosa, a rose.] A garden or parterre devoted to the cultivation of roses.

Rose-water (rôz'wa-têr), n. Watertinctured with roses by distillation.

Rose-water (rôz'wa-têr), a. Having the odour or character of rose-water; hence, affectedly delicate, fine, or sentimental. 'Rose-water philanthropy.' Carlyle.

Rose-window (rôz'win-dô), n. In arch. a circular window divided into compartments by mullions or tracery radiating or branching from a centre. It is called also Catherine-wheel and Marigold Window.

Rose-window, St. David's.

Rose-wood (rôz'wud), n. The name of the wood of numerous South American trees, chiefly belonging to the nat. order Leguminosæ. It is so named because some kinds of it, when freshly cut, have a faint agreeable smell of roses. It is obtained from Brazil, and is in the highest esteem for cabinet-work. Similar woods are also obtained from Siam and elsewhere.

Rosewort (rôz'wêrt), n. Same as Rose-root (which see).

Rosicrucian (roz-i-krô'shi-an), n. [L. rosa, a rose, and crux, crucis, a cross, the name originating from that of the alleged founder Rosencreuz (rosy cross).] One of a secret sect or society some account of which was given in several works published in Germany about the beginning of the seventeenth century, and which was said to have originated two or three centuries previous. Whether such an organized society ever did really exist or not is an open question, but it is well known that persons in the seventeenth century and subsequently have professed to belong to it. Its members are said to have made great pretensions to a knowledge of the secrets of nature, and especially as to the transmutation of metals, the prolongation of life, and acquaintance of what was occurring in distant regions, &c. The society was often known as Brothers of the Rosy Cross.

Rosicrucian (roz-i-krô'shi-an), a. Pertaining to the Rosicrucians or their arts.

Rosicrucianism (roz-i-krô'shi-an-izm), n. The arts, practices, or doctrines of the Rosicrucians.

Rosied (rôz'id), a. Adorned with roses or their colour.

Rosier† (rô'zhêr), n. [Fr.] A rose-bush. Spenser.

Rosière (rô-zî-âr), n. See ROSE-FESTIVAL.

Rosin (roz'in), n. [Corruption of resin. See RESIN.] The name given to resin when it is employed in a solid state for ordinary purposes. It is obtained from turpentine by distillation. In the process the oil of the turpentine comes over and the rosin remains behind. There are two principal varieties of rosin, one of which is of a brown and the other of a white colour. The brown variety, common rosin or colophony, is furnished by the Norway spruce fir, and is an amber-coloured, brittle solid, consisting of two isomeric acids, the sylic and pinic. The white variety, known commercially as galipot, is obtained from the turpentine yielded by Pinus maritima. The uses of rosin are numerous and well known.

Rosin (roz'in), v.t. To rub or cover over with rosin. 'With the rosin'd bow torment the string.' Gay.

Rosiness (rô-zî-nes), n. The quality of being rosy, or of resembling the colour of the rose. 'As the fair morn breaks through her rosiness.' Sir W. Davenant.

Rosin-oil (roz'in-oil), n. An oil manufactured from pine-resin, used for lubricating machinery, &c., and in France for printer's ink.

Rosin-tin (roz'in-tin), n. A miner's name for a pale-coloured native oxide of tin with a resinous lustre.

Rosiny (roz'in-i), a. Resembling rosin; abounding with rosin.

Rosland (ros'land), n. [W. rhos, peat, or a moor.] Heathy land; land full of ling; moorish or watery land.

Rosmarinet (rôz'ma-rin), n. 1. Sea-dew.

You shall, when all things else do sleep,
Save your chaste thoughts, with reverence steep
Your bodies in that purer brine
And wholesome dew called rosmarine.

B. Jonson.

2. A sea-monster fabled to climb to the tops of the cliffs by means of its teeth for the purpose of feeding on dew. 'Greedy rosmarine with visages deformed.' Spenser.

3. Rosemary. 'Biting of anise-seed and rosmarine.' Ep. Hall.

Rosmarinus (rôz'ma-rî-nus), n. Rosemary, a genus of plants. See ROSEMARY.

Rosoglio, Rosolio (rô-zô-li-ô), n. [It. rosolio.] 1. A red wine of Malta.—2. A species of the finest liqueurs or creams. Written also Rosoli.

Ross (ros), n. 1. [Comp. Dan. ros, chips or shavings of wood.] The rough scaly matter on the surface of the bark of certain trees. [American.]—2. [In this sense comp. W. rhos, peat, a moor.] The refuse of plants; also, a morass. Halliwel. [Provincial English.]

Ross (ros), v.t. [American; from the noun.] 1. To strip the ross from.—2. To strip bark from.—3. To cut up (bark) for boiling, &c.

Rossel† (ros'el), n. [W. rhos. See ROSLAND.] Light land; rosland (which see). Mortimer.

Rosselly† (ros'el-li), a. Loose; light. Mortimer.

Rosset (ros'et), n. The kalong or flying-fox. Written more correctly Roussette.

Rossignol (ros-sin'yol), n. [Fr. rossignol, formerly lossignol, from L. lusciniola, dim. of lusciniæ, a nightingale.] The nightingale.

Rosso-antico (ros'ô-an-tê'kô), n. [It. rosso, red, and antico, ancient.] A technical name for the red porphyry of Egypt, used by the ancients for statuary purposes.

Rost (rost), n. See ROUST.

Rostel (ros'tel), n. [L. rostellum, dim. of rostrum, a beak.] In bot. (a) an elevated and rather thickened portion of the stigma of orchidaceous plants, from which the peculiar gland separates by which the pollen masses of some species of that order are eventually held together. (b) Any small beak-shaped process, as in the stigma of many violets. (c) That part of the heart of a seed which descends and becomes the root.

Rostellaria (ros'tel-lâ-ri-a), n. A genus of marine univalves belonging to the family Strombidae. It is found both recent and fossil. The shell is fusiform or subturriculate, with an elevated pointed spire; the aperture is oval, canal projecting, and terminating in a pointed beak. The species are mostly found in the Asiatic seas.

Rostellate (ros'tel-lât), a. Having a rostell.

Rostelliform (ros'tel-li-form), a. Having the form of a rostell.

Rostellum (ros'tel-lum), n. Same as Rostel.

Roster (ros'têr), n. [D. rooster, a thing for roasting, a gridiron; hence, a grating, a table or list, a roster—the last meaning probably from perpendicular and horizontal lines of tabular statements giving a graded appearance.] A list showing the turn or rotation of service or duty of those who relieve or succeed each other; specifically, a military list or register showing or fixing the rotation in which individuals, companies, regiments, &c., are called on to serve.

You belong perhaps to a regiment which is among the highest on the roster for foreign service, and a sudden demand is caused by a reverse which has been sustained in one of our little wars. Sat. Rev.

Rostle† (ros'l), n. [See ROSTEL.] The beak of a ship.

Rostral (ros'tral), a. [L. rostralis, from rostrum, a beak.] 1. Pertaining to or resembling a rostrum.—Rostral column, a column dedicated to naval triumphs; it was ornamented with the rostra or prows of ships, whence the name.—Rostral crown. Same as Naval Crown. See under NAVAL.

Commerce wore a rostral crown upon her head. Tatler.

Fâte, fâr, fat, fâll; mē, met, hēr; pine, pîn; nôte, not, môve; tûbe, tub, bull; oil, pound; î, Sc. abune; ý, Sc. fey.

2. Pertaining to the beak of a bird or other animal.

Rostrate, Rostrated (rō'strāt, rō'strāt-ed), a. [L. rostratus, from rostrum, a beak.] 1. Furnished or adorned with beaks; as, rostrated galleys.—2. In bot. beaked; having a process resembling the beak of a bird.—3. In conch. applied to shells having a beak-like extension of the shell, in which the canal is situated.

Rostriform (rō'stri-form), a. [L. rostrum, a beak, and forma, a shape.] Having the form of a beak.

Rostrulum (rō'strū-lum), n. [Dim. of rostrum.] In entom. the oral instrument of the flea and other aphanipterans.

Rostrum (rō'strum), n. [L. the beak of a bird or other animal, the beak of a ship, from rodo, to gnaw; comp. rastrum, a harrow, from rado, to scrape.] 1. The beak or bill of a bird or other animal.—2. The beak of a ship; an ancient form of ram, consisting of a beam to which were attached sharp and pointed irons, the head of some animal or the like, and which was fixed to the bows of ships, sometimes above and sometimes below the water-line, and used for the purpose of attacking other vessels and breaking their sides.—3. A scaffold or elevated place in the forum, where orations, pleadings, funeral harangues, &c., were delivered: so called because it was first adorned with the rostra of the ships of the first naval victory obtained by the republic. [In this sense the Romans always used the plural form rostra.] Hence—4. A pulpit or any platform or elevated spot from which a speaker addresses his audience.—5. The pipe which conveys the distilling liquor into its receiver in the common alembic.—6. A crooked pair of scissors used by surgeons for dilating wounds.—7. In bot. an elongated receptacle with the styles adhering; also applied generally to any rigid process of remarkable length, or to any additional process at the end of any of the parts of a plant.—8. In entom. the beak or suctorial organ formed by the appendages of the mouth in certain insects. H. A. Nicholson.

Rosula (rōz'ū-lā), n. [Dim. of L. rosa, a rose.] A small rose; a rosette.

Rosulate (rōz'ū-lāt), a. In bot. having the leaves arranged in little rose-like clusters.

Rosy (rō'zī), a. 1. Resembling a rose in colour or qualities; red; blushing; blooming. 'A smile that glowed celestial rosy red.' Milton. 'The rosy morn.' Waller.

Her lily hand her rosy cheek lies under,
Cozening the pillow of a lawful kiss. Shak.

2. Made in the form of a rose. 'His rosy ties and garter so o'erblown.' B. Jonson.

Rosy-bosomed (rōzī-bō-zumd), a. Having the bosom of a rosy colour or filled with roses. 'The rosy-bosomed hours.' Gray.

Rosy-coloured (rōzī-kul-ed), a. Having the colour of a rose. 'Rosy-coloured Helen.' Dryden.

Rosy-cross (rōzī-kros), n. The red cross of the Rosicrucians.—Knights of the Rosy-cross, Rosicrucians (which see).

Rosy-crowned (rōzī-kround), a. Crowned with roses. Gray.

Rosy-drop (rōzī-drop), n. Carbuncled face, an eruption of small suppurating tubercles, with shining redness and an irregular granular appearance of the skin of the part of the face which is affected, often produced by hard drinking; grog-blossoms; brandy-face.

Rosy-fingered (rōzī-fing-gèrd), a. Having rosy fingers: borrowed from Homer's favourite epithet of the Dawn.

Rosy-kindled (rōzī-kin-dld), a. Suffused with a rosy colour; blushing.

Her bright hair blown about the serious face,
Yet rosy-kindled with her brother's kiss. Tennyson.

Rosy-tinted (rōzī-tint-ed), a. Having rose-tints. 'In tufts of rosy-tinted snow.' Tennyson.

Rot (rōt), v.i. pret. & pp. rotted; ppr. rotting. [A. Sax. rotian, D. rotten, to rot; Icel. rotna, to rot, to decay, rotinn, rotten.] 1. To decompose; to become putrid; to putrefy; to go to decay. 'The bodies of the animals would suddenly corrupt and rot.' Woodward.—2. Fig. to decay morally; to moulder; to rust. 'If man rot in dreamless ease.' Tennyson.

Wither, poor girl, in your garret; rot, poor bachelor, in your club. Thackeray.

SYN. To putrefy, corrupt, decay, spoil.

Rot (rōt), v.t. 1. To make putrid; to cause to be decomposed by natural operations; to bring to corruption; as, to rot hay with moisture.—2. To cause to take rot, as sheep.

Bakewell, when his sheep were past service, used to rot them purposely by feeding them on wet land, that they might not pass into other hands. Braude & Cox.

3. To expose to a process of partial rotting, as flax; to ret.—4. Used in the imperative as a sort of imprecation, like hang, confound, &c.; as, rot it.

'What are they fear'd on? fools! 'od rot 'em!'

Were the last words of Higginbottom. H. Smith.

Rot (rōt), n. 1. The process of rotting; putrid decay; putrefaction.—2. A fatal distemper incident to sheep, and sometimes affecting other animals, the immediate cause of the mortality being a great number of small animals, called flukes (Distoma hepaticum, see DISTOMA), found in the liver, and developed from germs swallowed with their food. The disease is promoted also by a humid state of atmosphere, soil, and herbage. It has different degrees of rapidity, but is always fatal at last; and the treatment of it is seldom successful, unless when early commenced, or when it is of a mild nature. 3. A disease very injurious to the potato; the potato disease. See under POTATO.—4. Nonsense; trash; bosh. [Slang.]

Crop, on the other hand, was evidently a beast who thought geniality, sympathy, and affection all 'rot.' Stuart Glennie.

—White rot, hydrocotyle, a small herb belonging to the nat. order Umbellifera; pennywort; sheep-rot.

Rota (rō'tā), n. [L. rota, a wheel (whence rotate, rotary, &c.). Comp. G. rad, a wheel; W. rhod, a wheel, rhedu, to run.] 1. An ecclesiastical court of Rome, composed of twelve prelates. It takes cognizance of all suits by appeal, and of all matters, beneficiary and patrimonial.—2. In Eng. hist. a name given to a political club founded by Harrington, the author of Oceana, in 1659, who advocated the election of the great officers of state by ballot, and the retirement of a certain number of members of parliament annually by rotation.—3. A school-rol. 'The senior fag who kept the rota.' T. Hughes.—4. A roll or list showing the order in which individuals are to be taken in turn; as, the regiment first on the rota for foreign service.

Rotacism (rō'tā-sizm), n. [Gr. rotakismos.] Faulty pronunciation of the letter R, a species of psellismus; burr. It is produced by trilling the extremity of the soft palate against the back part of the tongue.

Rota-club (rō'tā-klub), n. In Eng. hist. see ROTA, 2.

Rotæform (rō'tē-form), a. [L. rota, a wheel, and forma, shape.] In bot. same as Rotate.

Rotal (rō'tal), a. Rotary; pertaining to circular or rotary motion. [Rare.]

Rotalia (rō'tā-li-ā), n. A genus of the Foraminifera, so called from their nautiloid wheel-like contour. They are extremely minute, and are found fossil in the lias, oolite, and chalk in immense numbers and many species, and still swarm in the present seas. Called also Rotalites.

Rotary (rō'tā-ri), a. [From L. rota, a wheel.] Turning, as a wheel on its axis; pertaining to rotation; rotary; as, rotary motion.—Rotary engine. See under ROTATORY.—Rotary pump. See under PUMP.

Rotascope (rō'tā-skōp), n. [L. rota, a wheel, and Gr. skopē, to see.] Same as Gyroscope.

Rotate (rō'tāt), a. [L. rotatus, pp. of roto, to turn, from rota, a wheel.] In bot. wheel-shaped, monopetalous, spreading nearly flat, without any tube, or expanding into a nearly flat border, with scarcely any tube; as, a rotate corolla or calyx.

Rotate (rō'tāt), v.i. [L. rotare, rotatum, to turn round, from rota, a wheel.] 1. To revolve or move round a centre; to turn round, as a wheel.—2. To do anything, as to discharge a function or office, in rotation; to leave office and be succeeded by another.

Rotate (rō'tāt), v.t. pret. & pp. rotated; ppr. rotating. To cause to turn round like a wheel.

Rotate-plane, Rotato-plane (rō'tāt-plān, rō'tā'tō-plān), a. In bot. wheel-shaped and flat, without a tube; as, a rotate-plane corolla.

Rotation (rō'tā-shon), n. [L. rotatio, rotationis, from roto, to turn; rota, a wheel.]

1. The act of rotating or turning, or state of being whirled round; the motion of a solid body, as a wheel or sphere, about an axis, as distinguished from the progressive motion of a body revolving round another body or a distant point. Thus the daily turning of the earth on its axis is a rotation; its annual motion round the sun is a revolution.—Axis of rotation, the axis or line about which a rotating body turns.—Principal axes of rotation. If a point, which is not the centre of gravity, be taken in a solid body, all the axes which pass through that point (and they may be infinite in number) will have different moments of inertia, and there must exist one in which the moment is a maximum, and another in which it is a minimum. Those axes in respect of which the moment of inertia is a maximum or minimum are called the principal axes of rotation. In every body, however irregular, there are three principal axes of rotation, at right angles to each other, on any one of which, when the body revolves, the opposite centrifugal forces counterbalance each other, and hence the rotation becomes permanent.—Centre of rotation, the point about which a body revolves. It is the same as the centre of motion.—Centre of spontaneous rotation, the point about which a body, all whose parts are at liberty to move, and which has been struck in a direction not passing through its centre of gravity, begins to turn. If any force is impressed upon a body or system of bodies, in free space, and not in a direction passing through the centre of gravity of the body or system, a rotary motion will ensue about an axis passing through the centre of gravity, and the centre about which this motion is performed is called the centre of spontaneous rotation.—Angular velocity of rotation. When a solid body revolves about an axis its different particles move with a velocity proportional to their respective distances from the axis, and the velocity of the particle whose distance from the axis is unity is the angular velocity of rotation.—2. A peculiar spiral movement of fluids observed within the cavity of certain vegetable cells, as in Chara and Vallisneria.—3. A return or succession in a series; established succession; specifically, (a) the course by which officers or others leave their places at certain times, and are succeeded by others; as, the members of the directorate retire by rotation. (b) In agri. and hort. a recurring series of different crops grown on the same ground; the order of recurrence in cropping. It is found that the same annual crop cannot be advantageously cultivated on the same soils for more than one or two years, and hence one kind of crop is made to succeed another. But as the number of cultivated crops is limited, when the whole course has been gone through once it is again repeated; and hence the origin of the word rotation as applicable to crops. Different soils and climates require different systems of rotation, but it is a recognized rule in all cases that culmiferous crops ripening their seeds should not be repeated without the intervention of pulse, roots, herbage, or fallow.

The steward's books show what rents were paid and forgiven, what crops were raised, and in what rotation. Thackeray.

Rotational (rō'tā-shon-al), a. Pertaining to rotation.

If a body on the earth's surface . . . be urged by a force acting along a meridian it will . . . outrun the earth, or fall behind it, according as its original rotational velocity was greater or less than those of the places to which it comes. Prof. Everett.

Rotative (rō'tā-tiv), a. Turning, as a wheel; rotary. [Rare.]

Rotato-plane, a. See ROTATE-PLANE.

Rotator (rō'tā-tēr), n. [L.] That which rotates or causes rotation; that which gives a circular or rolling motion; especially, a muscle producing a rolling motion, as the muscles of the two apophyses in the upper part of the thigh-bone.

Rotatoria (rô-tâ-tô-ri-a), n. pl. [L. rota, a wheel.] A section of infusorial animals. See ROTIFERA.

Rotatory (rô-tâ-tô-ri), n. One of the Rotatoria; a wheel-animalcule. See ROTIFER.

Rotatory (rô-tâ-tô-ri), a. [From rotate; Fr. rotatoire.] 1. Pertaining to or consisting in rotation; characterized by rotation; exhibiting rotation; rotary; as, rotatory movements.

The ball-and-socket joint allows a rotatory or sweeping motion.

2. Going in a circle; following in succession; as, rotatory assemblies. Burke.—Rotatory or rotary steam-engine, an engine in which the piston (or what corresponds to it) rotates in the cylinder or the cylinder upon the piston, without the intervention of reciprocating parts. In the majority of cases in which the steam-engine is used as a source of power it is for the production of circular motion, and it has been naturally inferred that by simply causing the steam to act directly upon surfaces rigidly connected with the shaft to be set in motion the most powerful effect would be produced, and in the most economical manner. As yet, however, no rotatory engine has been constructed which has proved more economical than the reciprocating engine with crank attached.—Rotatory muscle, a rotator.—Rotatory polarization, the change of plane to the right or to the left which a ray of plane polarized light undergoes when passed through Iceland-spar, sugar, &c.

Rotche (rôch), n. [D. roffe, a petrel; comp. Prov. G. râtsche, a duck.] The popular name of a genus of British nautical birds (Mergulus or Cephus) of the auk family (Alcidae). The common rotche (M. melanoleucus) is about the size of a large pigeon, and purely oceanic, frequenting the arctic seas, and coming to land only during the breeding season. It is rare in Britain. Called also Little Auk, Sea Dove, and Greenland Dove.

Rotchet (rôch'et), n. The old name of a kind of fish. See ROCHET.

Rothe (rôt), n. [O.Fr. rota, L.L. rota, rotta, chrotta, from the Celtic; W. cruth, E. crowd, a fiddle.] An old stringed musical instrument, a kind of harp, lute, guitar, or viol. One variety is said to have been played with a wheel; a sort of hurdy-gurdy. 'The faire Peana playing on a rote.' Spenser. 'Worthy of great Phoebus' rote.' Spenser.

Rothe (rôt), n. [O.Fr. rote, a way, a route; hence rotine, rote, routine. See ROUTE.] 1. Frequent repetition of words or sounds without attending to the signification or to principles and rules; mere effort of memory; generally or always in the phrase by rote, by heart, by memory merely; as, to learn a lesson by rote. Sax. rūn, mystery, there being sundry superstitions connected with it; this is supported also by the Icel. name reynir, connected with reyna, to examine, rūn, a rune, mystery.] The mountain-ash (Pyrus Aucuparia). See MOUNTAIN-ASH.

Row-de-dow (rou'dē-dou), n. Same as Rowdy-dow.

Rowdy (rou'di), n. [From row, a disturbance.] A riotous turbulent fellow; a rough. [Colloq.]

Rowdy (rou'di), a. [Colloq.] 1. Rough; disreputable; blackguard.—2. Coarsely showy and pretentious; flashy.

(Those women) are too expensive and rowdy for me. Cornhill Mag.

Rowdy-dow (rou'di-dou), n. [Formed from imitation of the beat of a drum. Comp. rub-a-dub.] A word expressive of continuous noise. [Colloq. and vulgar.]

Rowdy-dowdy (rou'di-dou'di), a. [See ROWDY-DOW.] Noisy; turbulent. Notes and Queries.

The roots of one species are prepared with lime-water, candied with sugar, and taken with tea.

Roy (roi), a. Royal. Chapman.

Roy (roi), n. [Fr. roi.] A king.

Royal (rō'al), a. [Fr. royal, L. regalis, from rex, regis, a king. See REGAL.] 1. Pertaining or belonging to a king; pertaining to the crown; regal; as, royal power or prerogative; a royal garden; royal domains; the royal family.—2. Becoming a king; magnificent; kingly; princely; as, royal state. 'Royal dignity.' Milton. 'Young, valiant, wise, and no doubt, right royal.' Shak.—3. Noble; generous; dignified.

'Tis
The royal disposition of that beast
To prey on nothing that doth seem as dead. Shak.

4. Founded or originated by, in the service of, under the patronage of, or receiving support from royalty; as, royal navy; the Royal Academy (see ACADEMY); the Royal Society (see below); Royal National Life-boat Institution; royal tradesmen; royal servants.—Royal antler, the third branch of the horn of a deer. See ANTLER.—Royal assent. See ASSENT.—Royal bay, the Laurus indica or Indian bay.—Royal blue, a fine deep blue prepared from cobalt, used for enamel and glass, and porcelain painting. The name is also given to a fine, deep, aniline blue.—Royal burgh. See BURGH.—Royal charter. See CHARTER.—Royal fish. See REGAL.—Royal glass, painted glass. Britton.—Royal grant, a grant by letters patent from the crown.—Royal merchant, formerly applied to Italian merchants who founded principalities which their descendants enjoyed, such as the Grimaldi of Venice, the Medici of Florence, and others; also applied to one who managed the mercantile affairs of a state or kingdom.

(b) The Robur Caroli, a southern constellation.—Royal Society (of London), a society incorporated by Charles II. in 1660, under the name of 'The President, Council, and Fellows of the Royal Society for the Improvement of Natural Philosophy.' Its Transactions, the publication of which began in 1665, and has been regularly continued since, contain perhaps the most valuable repository of scientific research in existence. A somewhat similar society, the Royal Society of Edinburgh, for the investigation and discussion of subjects in science, art, and literature, was founded in 1783.—Royal standard. See STANDARD.—Royal, Regal, Kingly. Regal is a more abstract epithet than royal, and of more general application. It is applied primarily to what pertains to a king in virtue of his office; hence, to what becomes a king, or what is suggestive of a king, and as now frequently used is nearly synonymous with princely, magnificent; as, regal state, regal power, regal pomp. Royal is of narrower application, and denotes what pertains to the king as an individual, or is associated with his person; as, his royal highness; the royal family; the royal presence; the royal robes; a royal salute. It does not, like regal, necessarily imply magnificence. Thus a royal residence may not be regal in its character, while on the other hand any magnificent mansion belonging to a subject may be described as regal, though it is not royal. The sway of a great Highland chief of old was regal, but not royal. Kingly seems to be intermediate. It signifies literally like a king, hence proper to or becoming a king, and in its more general use resembling or suggestive of a king. Like royal it has reference to personal qualities, as a kingly bearing, presence, disposition, and the like, while like regal it is not restricted to the monarch or members of his house.—SYN. Kingly, regal, monarchical, imperial, kinglike, princely, august, majestic, superb, splendid, magnificent, illustrious, noble, magnanimous.

And sigh in royalty, and grieve in state. Prior.

(b) The state of being royal by birth; high extraction. 'Setting aside his high blood's royalty.' Shak. (c) The character of being kingly or becoming a king; kingly character; kinglyness.

In his royalty of nature
Reigns that which would be feared. Shak.

2. The person of a king; majesty; as, to stand in the presence of royalty. 'For thus his royalty doth speak.' Shak.

Draw, you rascal; you come with letters against the king and take vanity the puppet's part against the royalty of her father. Shak.

3. A right or prerogative of a king; especially, a signorato due to a king from a manor of which he is lord, or the manor itself; a tax paid to the crown or a landowner on the produce of a mine; a tax paid to a superior as representing the king.

With the property were inseparably connected extensive royalties. Macaulay.

Hence—4. A tax paid to one who holds a patent protected by government for the use of the patent, generally at a certain rate for each article manufactured; a percentage paid to the owner of an article for its use.—5. Kingdom; domain; province; sphere.

The vast and inexhaustible variety of knavery, folly, affectation, humour, &c., as mingled with each other, or as modified by difference of age, sex, temper, education, profession, and habit of body, are all within the royalty of the modern comic dramatist. The ancients were much more limited in their circle of materials. Sir W. Scott.

6. An emblem of royalty.

Wherefore do I assume
These royalties, and not refuse to reign. Milton.

7. In Scotland, the area occupied by a royal burgh, or (in plural) the bounds of a royal burgh.

Royal-yard (roi'al-yärd), n. Naut. The fourth yard from the deck, on which the royal is set.

Royena (roi-é'na), n. [After Adrian van Royen, a Dutch botanist.] A Cape genus of shrubs or trees, nat. order Ebenaceae, differing from the true ebony (Diospyros) and others in having fertile and sterile flowers on the same instead of on different plants. They have a five-lobed calyx and a five-parted bell-shaped corolla, and bear globular or elliptical berries about the size of damsons. R. lucida is a pretty white-flowered bush sometimes cultivated in greenhouses.

Royne† (roin), v.t. [Fr. rogner.] To bite; to gnaw. Spenser.

Royne† (roin), v.i. [Fr. rogner, to growl.] To growl. Spenser.

Roynish (roin'ish), a. [Fr. rogneux, mangy, from rogne, scab; L. rubigo, rubiginis.] Mangy; scabby; hence, mean; paltry; scurvy. 'The roynish clown.' Shak. Spelled also Roimish.

Roytish (roi'tish), a. [Probably for roistish or routish.] Wild; irregular.

No weed presumed to show its roytish face.

Rub (rub), v.t. pret. & pp. rubbed; ppr. rubbing. [Same word as Dan. rubbe, to rub, to scrub. The Celtic languages also have the word, which may be originally Celtic. W. rhub, a rub, a chafe, rhwbïad, a rubbing; Gael. rub, rubadh, Ir. rubha, a wound, a hurt, rubadh, attrition. Rubbish, rubble are derivatives.] 1. To move along the surface of, or backwards and forwards upon, with friction; to apply friction to; as, to rub the face or arms with the hand; to rub the body with flannel; hence, to wipe; to clean; to scour.

Go, sir, rub your chain with crums. Shak.

2. To spread a thin coating over the surface of; to smear all over; to spread over; as, to rub anything with oil. 'Their straw-built citadel, new rub'd with balm.' Milton.—3. To polish; to retouch; with over.

Rubble-work, Rubble-wall (rub'l-wérk, rub'l-wal-ing), n. Walls or masonry built of rubble-stones. Rubble-walls are either coursed or uncoursed; in the former the stones are roughly dressed and laid in courses, but without regard to equality in the height of the courses; in the latter (called random-rubble) the stones are used as they occur, the interstices between the larger stones being filled in with smaller pieces.

Rubby (rub'l-i), a. Abounding in small irregular stones; containing rubble.

Rubedinos (rō-béd'in-us), a. [L. rubedo, redness, from rubere, to be red.] Reddish. Mos. Stuart. [Rare.]

Rubefacient (rū-bé-fā'shi-ent), a. [L. rubefaciens, rubefaciens, ppr. of rubefacio—rubeo, to be red, and facio, to make.] Making red.

Rubefacient (rū-bé-fā'shi-ent), n. In med. a substance for external application which produces redness of the skin, not followed by blister.

Rubefaction (rū-bé-fak'shon), n. The act of producing redness of the skin, as by a rubefacient; the state of being made red.

Rubellite (rō'bél-it), n. [L. rubellus, dim. of rubus, red, and lithos, a stone.] Red tourmaline, a siliceous mineral of a red colour of various shades; the red short; siberite. It occurs in accumulated groups of a middle or large size, with straight tubular-like striae. It acquires opposite electricities by heat.

Rubens-brown (rō'benz-broun), n. [From the great Flemish painter Rubens, who was partial to the use of it.] A rich and durable brown pigment, warmer and more ochreous than Vandyke-brown.

Rubeola (rō-bé'ō-la), n. [New L., from L. ruber, red.] In med. the measles (which see).

Rubeoloid (rū-bé'ō-loid), a. [Rubeola, and Gr. eidos, resemblance.] Resembling rubeola. Dunglison.

Rubescence (rū-bes'sens), n. A growing rubescent or red; the state of becoming or being red; a blush. Roget.

Rubescens (rū-bes'sent), a. [L. rubescens, rubescens, ppr. of rubescere, incept. from rubere, to be red, from rubus, red.] Growing or becoming red; tending to a red colour.

Rubezahl (rō-be-tsāl), n. Number Nip, a famous mountain spirit of Germany, sometimes friendly, sometimes mischievous; a familiar imp, corresponding to our Puck, and said to be generally favourable to the poor and oppressed, but waging war on the proud and wicked. He is the hero of many ballads and tales, and of several operas.

Rubia (rō'bi-a), n. [L. rubia, madder, from rubescere, red—in allusion to the colour obtained from the roots.] A genus of plants found both in Europe and Asia, belonging to the nat. order Rubiaceae. They are perennial herbs often woody below, with whorled entire leaves and small yellowish flowers. Several species are employed in medicine,

Fâte, fâr, fat, fall: mē, met, hér; pine, pin; nôte, not, môve: tûbe, tub, bull; oil, pound; ū, Sc. abune; ý, Sc. fey.

and also in the arts, for the sake of the colouring matter which is contained in the roots. R. tinctorum is the well-known madder plant. (See Madder.) The root of R. cordifolia yields the munjeet of India. See MUNJEET.

Rubiaceæ (rô-bi-â-sê-è), n. pl. A large natural order of exogenous plants, comprising the orders Cinchonaceæ and Galiaceæ, and including all monopetalous plants with opposite leaves, interpetiolar stipules, stamens inserted in the tube of the corolla and alternating with its lobes, and an inferior compound ovary.

Rubiacin, Rubiacine (rô-bi-a-sin), n. ($C_{12}H_{22}O_{10}$). A yellow crystallizable colouring matter found in madder root.

Rubian, Rubiane (rô-bi-an), n. ($C_{26}H_{34}O_{18}$). The bitter principle and colour-producing matter of madder. On trying to dye with rubian in the usual manner the mordants assume only the faintest shades of colour. If, however, the watery solution be mixed with sulphuric or muriatic acid and boiled it gradually deposits a quantity of insoluble yellow flocks, which, after being separated by filtration and well washed, are found to dye the same colours as those obtained by means of madder. In fact, these flocks contain alizarine, to which they owe their tinctorial power.

Rubican (rô-bi-kan), a. [Fr., from L. rubeo, to be red.] A term applied to the colour of a bay, sorrel, or black horse, with light-gray or white upon the flanks, but the gray or white not predominant there.

Rubicatei (rô-bi-kât-iv), n. That which produces a reddish or ruby colour.

Rubiceal, Rubicelle (rô-bi-sel), n. [L. rubeo, to be red.] A variety of ruby of a reddish colour, from Brazil.

Rubicon (rô-bi-kon), n. A small river which separated Italy from Cisalpine Gaul, the province allotted to Julius Cæsar. The crossing of this river by Cæsar was the first step in the civil war between him and Pompey, and was equivalent to a declaration of war. Hence the phrase to pass or cross the Rubicon signifies to take a decisive step in an enterprise, or to adopt a measure from which one cannot or will not recede.

Rubicund (rô-bi-kund), a. [L. rubicundus, from rubeo, to be red.] Inclining to redness; ruddy; blood-red; said especially of the face. "Pistol's rubicund nose." Douce.

Rubicundity (rô-bi-kun-di-ti), n. The state of being rubicund; redness.

I do not wish you to parade your rubicundity and gray hairs. H. Walpole.

Rubidium (rô-bid-i-um), n. [L. rubidus, red.] Sym. Rb.; at. wt. 85.4. A metal belonging to the group of elements which likewise includes lithium, sodium, potassium, and cesium. It was discovered by Kirchhoff and Bunsen, in 1860, by the method of spectral analysis. Its spectrum is chiefly distinguished by two bright red lines situated beyond the line A; hence the name. Rubidium was first detected, together with cesium, in the mineral water of Dürkheim, in which it exists to the amount of two parts in ten million. It has since been found in large quantity, together with cesium and lithium, in several other saline waters, and most abundantly in that of Bourbonne-les-Bains. It is also found in several lepidolites; that of Rozena, in Moravia, contains 0.24 per cent rubidium, with only a trace of cesium; that of Hebron, in the state of Maine, 0.24 per cent rubidium and 0.3 per cent cesium. The two metals likewise occur, though in smaller quantity, in the lepidolite of Prague, the petalite of Utö in Finland, the lithia-mica of Zinnwald in Bohemia, and other lithia minerals. It has been found also in the ashes of many plants, and in the saline or crude potash obtained from the residue of the beetroot-sugar manufacture. It has been found in tobacco leaves, in coffee, tea, cocoa, and crude tartar. In minerals and mineral waters rubidium and cesium are always associated with lithium, and generally also with potassium and sodium; but plants have the power of assimilating two or three of these metals to the exclusion of the rest; thus tea, coffee, and the saline of beet-root contain potassium, sodium, and rubidium, but not a trace of lithium.

Rubied (rô-bid), a. Red as a ruby; as, a rubied lip; rubied nectar. Shak.

How is one to tell of the rounded bosses of furred and beaming green,—the starred divisions of rubied bloom, fine-filmed, as if the Rock Spirits could spin porphyry as we do glass? Ruskin.

Rubific (rô-bif'ik), a. [L. ruber, red, and facio, to make.] Making red; as, rubific rays. Grev.

Rubification (rô-bi-fi-kä'shon), n. The act of making red. Hovell.

Rubiform (rô-bi-form), a. [L. ruber, red, and forma.] Having the character or nature of red.

Of those rays which pass close by the snout the rubiform will be the least refracted. Newton.

Rubify (rô-bi-fi), v. t. [See RUBIFY.] To make red; to redden. 'Rubifying medicine.' Sir T. Browne. [Rare.]

Rubiginose (rô-bij'in-ös), a. Brown-red. In bot. a term usually employed to denote a surface whose peculiar colour is owing to glandular hairs. Treas. of Bot.

Rubiginous (rô-bij'in-us), a. Exhibiting or affected by rubigo; rusty; mildewed. Dun-glison.

Rubigo (rô-bi-gô), n. [L.] A kind of rust on plants, consisting of a parasitic fungus or mushroom; mildew.

Rubin (rô-bin), n. A ruby.

Rubious (rô-bi-us), a. [L. rubens, from rubeo, to be red.] Resembling a ruby; rubied; red.

Is not more smooth and rubious. Shak.

Rubiretin (rô-bir'e-tin), n. [L. ruber, red, and Gr. rêtinê, resin.] ($C_{10}H_{16}O_2$). A resinous colouring matter, isomeric with benzoic acid, existing in madder.

Ruble (rô-bl), n. Same as Rouble.

Rubric (rô-brik), n. [Fr. rubrique; L. rubrica (terra), red earth, the title of a law in red, a law, from rubro, red.] 1. Some part of a manuscript or printed matter that is, or in former times usually was, coloured red, to distinguish it from other portions; hence, (a) the title-page or parts of it; the initial letters, &c., when written or printed in red. (b) In law books, the title of a statute, so called because it was formerly written in red letters. (c) In prayer-books or other liturgical works, the directions and rules for the conduct of service, often printed in red; hence, an ecclesiastical or episcopal rule or injunction.

They had their particular prayers, according to the several days and months; and their tables or rubrics to instruct them. Stillingfleet.

2. Any formulated, fixed, or authoritative injunction of duty; hence, recognition as fixed or settled by authority.

Nay, as a duty, it had no place or rubric in human conceptions before Christianity. De Quincey.

Rubric (rô-brik), v. t. To adorn with red. Johnson.

Rubric, Rubrical (rô-brik, rô-brik-al), a. 1. Red; marked with red.

What though my name stood rubric on the walls Or painted posts? Pope.

2. Placed in rubrics.—3. Pertaining to the rubric. 'Rubrical eccentricities.' Kingsley.

Rubricate (rô-brik-ât), v. t. [L. rubrico, rubricated, from rubro.] See RUBRIC. To mark or distinguish with red. Sir T. Herbert.

Rubricate, Rubricated (rô-brik-ât, rô-brik-ât-ed), a. Marked with red.

Rubrician (rô-bri'shan), n. One versed in the rubric; an adherent or advocate for the rubric. Quart. Rev.

Rubricist (rô-bri-sist), n. Same as Rubrician. Rubricity (rô-bri-si-ti), n. [L. rubrica, ruddle.] Redness. 'Rubricity of the Nile.' Geddes.

Rubsen-cake (rôb'sen-käk), n. [G. rubsen, contr. for rubesenen, rape-seed—rub, rape, and samen, seed—and cake.] An oil-cake, much used on the Continent, made from the Brassica præcox.

Rub-stone (rub'stôn), n. A stone, usually some kind of sandstone, used to sharpen instruments; a whetstone; a rub. Tusser.

Rubus (rô-bus), n. [L. from rubeo, to be red—in reference to the colour of the fruit of some of the species.] A genus of plants, nat. order Rosaceæ, sub-order Roseæ. The species, which consist of shrubs, are universally diffused over the mountainous and temperate regions of the Old and New World. Several are cultivated both as ornaments and on account of their agreeable acid and astringent fruit. They have alternate simple or compound leaves and white or red flowers. There are about a hundred species, among which are the British R. Idaeus, or raspberry; R. fruticosus, or common bramble; R. saxatilis, or stone-bramble or roebuck-berry; and R. Chamæmorus, mountain-bramble or cloudberry.

Ruby (rô-bi), n. [Fr. rubis (s silent), Pr. robis, Sp. rubí, rubin, from L. L. rubinus, a carbuncle, from L. rubens, red, reddish, rubro, red.] 1. A crystallized gem next to the diamond in hardness and even more valuable, found in Burmah, Siam, Ceylon, and elsewhere. It is of various shades of red, but the most highly prized varieties are the crimson and carmine red. Among lapidaries the scarlet-coloured spinel is sometimes called spinel ruby; the pale or rose-red, balas ruby; and the yellowish-red, rubicelle. The true ruby is a modification of the corundum. (See CORUNDUM.) It consists of nearly pure alumina with magnesia, &c.—2. Redness; red colour.

You can behold such sights, And keep the natural ruby of your cheeks, While mine are blanched with fear. Shak.

3. Something resembling a ruby; a blain; a blotch; a carbuncle.—4. In printing, a type smaller than nonpareil and larger than pearl.—Ruby of arsenic or sulphur, is the proto-sulphide of arsenic, or red compound of arsenic and sulphur.—Ruby of zinc, is the sulphide of zinc or red blende.—Rock ruby, the most valued species of garnet.

Ruby (rô-bi), v. t. To make red. With sanguine drops the walls are rubied round. Pope.

Ruby (rô-bi), a. Of the colour of the ruby; red; as, ruby lips. Shak.

[Old slang.]

The greedy carle came within a space
That own'd the gold, and saw the pot behind
Where ruddocks lay, but ruddocks could not find.
Turberville.

The ruddy herring brought in the red ruddocks
... and made Yarmouth for argent put down the city of Argent. Nash.

If he have won golden ruddocks in his bag he must be wise and honourable. Lily.

Ruddy (rud'i), a. [From A. Sax. rud, red, rudu, redness. See RED.] 1. Of a red colour, or of a colour approaching redness. 'New leaves . . . some ruddy coloured.' Dryden. 'Smoke and ruddy flame.' Milton. 'Dear as the ruddy drops that warm my heart.' Gray.—2. Of a lively flesh-colour, or the colour of the human skin in high health. Thus we say, ruddy cheeks, ruddy lips, a ruddy face or skin, a ruddy youth, and ruddy fruit. But the word is chiefly applied to the human skin.

His face was ruddy, his hair was gold. Tennyson.
3. Of a reddish shining colour; as, ruddy gold. This epithet, as well as red, was applied to gold probably because it used to be considerably alloyed with copper, which gave it a reddish colour.

A crown of ruddy gold inclosed her brow. Dryden.

Ruddy (rud'i), v.t. pret. & pp. ruddied; ppr. ruddying. To make red or ruddy.

Rude (rōd), a. [Fr. rué, rough, rugged, severe, from L. rudis, in a natural state, not changed or improved by art, hence rough, raw, wild.] 1. Rudiment (rō'di-ment), n. [L. rudimentum, from rudis, rude. See RUE.] 1. That which is in an undeveloped state; the principle which lies at the beginning or bottom of any development; an unformed or unfinished beginning. 'Moss is but the rudiment of a plant.' Bacon.

The happy boughs
Attire themselves with blooms, sweet rudiments
Of future harvest. F. Philip.

2. An element or first principle of any art or science; especially in plural, the beginnings, first steps, or introduction to any branch of knowledge; the elements or elementary notions.

To learn the order of my fingering
I must begin with rudiments of art. Shak.

The proposed law, they said, was a retrospective penal law, and therefore objectionable. If they used this argument in good faith they were ignorant of the very rudiments of the science of legislation. Macaulay.

3. In biol. an imperfect organ; an organ which is never fully developed.

Rudiment (rō'di-ment), v.t. To furnish with first principles or rules; to ground; to settle in first principles.

It is the right discipline of knight-errantry to be rudimented in losses at first, and to have the tyrocinium somewhat tart. Gayton.

Rudimental (rō-di-ment'al), a. Relating to first principles; rudimentary.

Your first rudimental essays in spectatorship were made in my shop, where you often practised for hours. Spectator.

Rudimentary (rō-di-ment'a-ri), a. 1. Pertaining to rudiments or first principles; consisting in or dealing with first principles; elementary; initial.—2. In the state or form of a rudiment; in an undeveloped state; imperfectly developed; in the first stage of existence; embryonic.

In the abdominal muscles of mammals, again, we find the abdominal sternum and ribs of Saurian reptiles indicated by white fibrous bands; and in these mammals, which do not possess a clavicle, that bone is usually represented by a ligament, just as the stylo-hyoid ligament in man represents a portion of the hyoidian arch which is elsewhere completely ossified. Such rudimentary structures, however, often display themselves at an early period of development, and are subsequently lost sight of. Dr. Carpenter.

Rudity (rō'di-ti), n. Rudeness. [Rare.]

Rudmas-day† (rōd'mas-dā), n. [That is, rood-mas day, from rood, a cross.] The feast of the Holy Cross. There were two of these feasts annually; one on May 3d, the Invention of the Holy Cross, and the other on Sept. 14, the Holyrood day, or the Exaltation of the Holy Cross.

Rudolphine (rō-dol'fin), a. An epithet applied to a set of astronomical tables composed by Kepler, and founded on the observations of Tycho Brahe. They were so named in honour of Rudolph II., emperor of Bohemia.

Rue (rō), v.t. pret. & pp. rued; ppr. ruing. [A. Sax. hreoivan, to repent, to rue; cog. D. rouwen, O.H.G. hriuwon (Mod. Old year, we'll dearly rue for you. Tennyson.

Rue† (rō), n. Sorrow; repentance. Shak.

Rue (rō), n. [Fr. rue, from L. ruta, from Gr. rutē, rue.] A strong-scented plant of the genus Ruta, nat. order Rutaceæ. The species are suffrutescent herbaceous plants, with alternate exstipulated pinnated or decompound leaves, covered with pellucid dots. Comparatively few of them are known or cultivated. R. graveolens, or common rue, sometimes called herb-grace, has been used from time immemorial, along with rosemary, as an emblem of remembrance and grace, on account of its evergreen foliage. Other authorities connect the name 'herb-grace' (or as Shakspeare has it 'herb of grace') with the ancient use of the plant as a disinfectant, in exorcizing evil spirits, or in sprinkling the people with holy water. Jeremy Taylor, for instance, speaks of exorcists being about to 'try the devil by holy water, incense, sulphur, and rue, which from thence, as we suppose, came to be called 'herb of grace.' The stamens are remarkable for their presenting an instance of vegetable irritability. Every part of it is marked by transparent dots filled with volatile oil, which is obtained from it by distillation. The odour of rue is very strong and disagreeable, and the taste acrid and bitter; it possesses powerful stimulant, antispasmodic, and tonic properties, and when judiciously used is very serviceable in hysteria and other convulsive disorders.

Here in this place
I'll set a bank of rue, sour herb of grace:
Rue, even for ruth, here shortly shall be seen,
In the remembrance of a weeping queen. Shak.

Rueful (rū'fūl), a. 1. Causing to rue or lament; woful; mournful; sorrowful; to be lamented. 'Spur them to rueful work.' Shak.—2. Expressing sorrow; suggesting sorrow or melancholy; pitiful. 'Two rueful figures with long black cloaks.' Sir W. Scott.

He sighed and cast a rueful eye. Dryden.

SYN. Woful, mournful, sorrowful, doleful, lamentable, piteous.

Ruefully (rū'fūl-lī), adv. In a rueful manner; mournfully; sorrowfully.

4. A particular species of pigeon having feathers disposed round its neck in the form of a ruff.—5. A genus (Machetes) of wading birds of the family Scolopacidae, of which genus M. pugnax is the only known species. It is alike curious in the disposition of its plumage and for its pugnacious character. It derives its common name from the disposition of the long feathers of the neck in the male, which stand out like a ruff. The ruffs are birds of passage, appearing at certain seasons of the year in the north of Europe. When taken and fattened they are dressed like the woodcock, and their flesh is much esteemed. The female is called reeve.

Ruff (Machetes pugnax).

6. † A state of roughness; ruggedness; hence, rude or riotous procedure or conduct. 'To ruffle it out in a riotous ruff.' Latimer. As fields set all their bristles up, in such a ruff wert thou. Chapman.

7. † The top of a loose boot turned over. Shak. 8. In mach, an annular ridge formed on a shaft or other piece, commonly at a journal, to prevent endlong motion. Thus a are ruffs limiting the length of the journal b, to which the pillows or brasses are exactly fitted, so that the shaft is prevented from moving on end. Ruffs sometimes consist of separate rings fixed in the positions intended Rugosa (rô-gô'sa), n. pl. [L. rugosus, wrinkled.] An order of extinct Actinozoa, with whose corallum we are alone acquainted, all, with one exception (Holocystis elegans, which occurs in the lower cretaceous series), from paleozoic rocks. The corallum is highly developed, sclerodermic, with true thecæ, and the septa and tabulæ are often combined. Agassiz proposes to class the Rugosa under the Hydrozoa rather than with the Actinozoa. The septa of rugose corals are developed in multiples of four.

Rugose (rô-gô's), a. [L. rugosus, from ruga, a wrinkle.] Wrinkled; full of wrinkles. 'The internal rugose coat of the intestines.' Wiseman. In bot. a term applied to a leaf in which the veins are more contracted than the disc, so that the latter rises into little inequalities, as in sage, primrose, cow-slip, &c.

Rugosity (rô-gô'si-ti), n. 1. A state of being rugose or wrinkled.—2. A wrinkle; a pucker; a slight ridge.

Rugous (rô'gus), a. Same as Rugose. Owen.

Rugulose (rô'gû-lôs), a. In bot. finely wrinkled, as a leaf.

Ruin (rô'in), n. [Fr. ruine, from L. ruina, a falling down, downfall, ruin, from ruo, ruum, to fall with violence, to rush down.] 1.† The act of falling or tumbling down; violent fall. 'His ruin startled the other steeds.' Chapman.—2. That change of anything which destroys it or entirely defeats its object, or unfits it for use; destruction; overthrow; downfall; as, the ruin of a house; the ruin of an army; the ruin of a government; the ruin of health. 'Utter ruin of the house of York.' Shak. 'Fed the ruin of the state.' Shak.—3. That which promotes injury, decay, or destruction; bane; destruction; perdition.

The errors of young men are the ruin of business. Bacon.

And he said, Because the gods of the kings of Syria help them, therefore will I sacrifice to them that they may help me. But they were the ruin of him and of all Israel. 1 Chr. xxviii. 23.

4. A building or anything in a state of decay or dilapidation; something breaking up or hastening to destruction; a wreck; as, his mind is now a mere ruin. 'A Gothic ruin.' Tennyson.—5. pl. The remains of a decayed or demolished city, house, fortress, or any work of art or other thing; as, the ruins of Balbec, Palmyra, or Persepolis; the ruins of a wall. [There is little difference between this and the preceding sense, only in the former the ruined object is looked at as a whole, in this is considered to be made up of parts; and while we call a ruined building a ruin, we generally speak of the ruins of the building.]

The labour of a day will not build up a virtuous habit on the ruins of an old and vicious character. Buckminster.

6. The state of being ruined, decayed, destroyed, or rendered worthless; as, to go to ruin.

Repair thy wit, good youth, or it will fall To careless ruin. Shak.

SYN. Destruction, downfall, perdition, fall, overthrow, subversion, defeat, bane, pest, mischief.

Ruin (rô'in), v.t. To bring to ruin; to cause to fall to pieces or decay; to make to perish; to bring to destruction; to impair seriously; to damage essentially; to destroy; to defeat; to overthrow; to demolish; as, to ruin a city, a government, commerce, one's health, constitution, or reputation. 'Resolved to ruin or to rule the state.' Dryden.

By thee raised, I ruin all my foes, Milton.

A nation loving gold must rule this place, Our temples ruin and our rites deface. Dryden.

The eyes of other people are the eyes that ruin us. Franklin.

Ruin (rô'in), v.i. 1. To fall into ruins; to run to ruin; to fall into decay or be dilapidated.

Though he his house of polish'd marble build, Yet shall it ruin like the moth's frail cell. Sandys.

Rulable (rô'a-bl), a. 1. Capable of being ruled; governable.—2. Subject to rule; accordant to rule. Bacon.

Rule (rôl), n. [O.E. reule, rewle, from O.Fr. reule, riule (Mod. Fr. règle), from L. regula, a straight piece of wood, a ruler, a rule, pattern, or model (whence regular), from rego, to keep or lead in a straight line. See REGAL, also RIGHT.] 1. Government; sway; empire; control; supreme command or authority.

A wise servant shall have rule over a son that causeth shame. Prov. xvii. 2.

And his stern rule the groaning land obey'd. Pope.

2. That which is established as a principle, standard, or guide for action; that by which any procedure is to be adjusted or regulated, or to which it is to be conformed; that which is settled by authority or custom for guidance and direction; as, (a) an established mode or course of proceeding prescribed in private life.

A rule which you do not apply is no rule at all. J. M. Mason.

A rule that relates even to the smallest part of our life, is of great benefit to us, merely as it is a rule. Law.

Hence, (1) a line of conduct; behaviour.

If you prized my lady's favour at any thing more than contempt, you would not give means for this un-civil rule. Shak.

(2) Method; regularity; propriety of behaviour.

He cannot buckle his distemper'd cause Within the belt of rule. Shak.

(b) A maxim, canon, or precept to be observed in any art or science.

For in writing what I have set about, I shall confine myself neither to his (Horace's) rules, nor to any man's rules that ever lived. Steuern.

(c) In monasteries, corporations, or societies, a law or regulation to be observed by the society and its particular members; also the body of such laws or regulations; as, to live according to the rule of St. Benedict. (d) In law, a point of law settled by authority; also, the mode of procedure settled by lawful judicial authority for some court or courts of justice. Rules are either general or particular. General rules are such orders relating to matters of practice as are laid down and promulgated by the court for the general guidance of the suitors. Formerly each court of common law issued its own general rules, without much regard to the practice in the other courts; but of late the object has been to assimilate the practice in all the courts of common law. They are a declaration of what the court will do, or require to be done, in all matters falling within the terms of the rule, and they resemble in some respects the Roman edict. Particular rules are such as are confined to the particular case in reference to which they have been granted.—Rules of course, those which are drawn up by the proper officers on the authority of the mere signature of counsel; or, in some instances, as upon a judge's fiat, or allowance by the master, &c., without any signature by counsel. Rules which are not of course are grantable on the motion, either of the party actually interested, or of his counsel.—A rule to show cause, or a rule nisi, means that unless the party against whom it has been obtained shows sufficient cause to the contrary, the rule, which is conditional, will become absolute. (e) In arith. and alg. a determinate mode prescribed for performing any operation and producing a certain result; a certain prescribed series of operations, adapted to discover, from the given conditions to which an unknown number,

Fâte, fâr, fat, fall; mē, met, hêr; pine, pin; nôte, net, môve; tûbe, tub, buil;

oil, pound; ü, Sc. abune; ý, Sc. fey.

&c., is subjected, what that number, &c., is; as, rules for addition, subtraction, &c.; rules for practice; rules for the extraction of roots, &c. Algebraic rules are often expressed in formulas; thus, if a, b, c represent the three sides of a right-angled triangle, of which c is the hypotenuse, the formula for determining c is $c = \sqrt{a^2 + b^2}$. — Rule of three. See PROPORTION, 7. (f) In gram, an established form of construction in a particular class of words; or the expression of that form in words. Thus it is a rule in English, that s or es, added to a noun in the singular number, forms the plural of that noun; but man forms its plural men, and is an exception to the rule. 3. An instrument by which lines are drawn; also, an instrument for measuring short lengths, and performing various operations in mensuration. There are of course numerous kinds of rules adapted to their peculiar objects. A common form is the rule for making linear measurements, used by carpenters and other artificers. It is divided into inches and fractions, and is usually jointed, so that it may be folded up and carried in the pocket. Those used by some classes of artificers are, however, made in a single piece. See RULER. — Gauging rule. Same as Gauging-rod (which see). See also Parallel ruler, under PARALLEL, SLIDING-RULE. — 4. In printing, a thin plate of metal, of the same height as types, usually brass, used for separating headings, titles, the columns of type in a book, or columns of type in tabular work, &c.; also a slip of metal laid above the last line set, to facilitate placing type in the stick. — 5. In plastering, a strip of wood placed on the face of a wall as a guide to assist in keeping the plane surface. — Rule joint, a movable joint such as those in the rules used by carpenters and other artificers. — Rule of the road, the rule that a driver or rider, on passing another, must pass on the right hand of the other. In other countries than Britain the rule is the opposite. The rule of the road at sea is more complicated. — Rule of thumb, a rule suggested by a practical rather than a scientific knowledge. — Rules of a prison, certain limits without the walls, within which prisoners in custody were sometimes allowed to live. ‘The rules of the Fleet,’ Thackeray. — SYN. Government, sway, empire, control, direction, regulation, law, canon, precept, maxim, guide, order, method.

Rule (röl), v. t. pret. & pp. *rul*ed; ppr. ruling. 1. To govern; to command; to exercise authority or dominion over; to control; to conduct; to manage; to bridle; to restrain. Rundlet, n. See RUNLET.

Rune (rön), n. [A Sax. rün, a letter, a mysterious or magical character, a mystery; the word has substantially the same form and meaning in the other Teutonic tongues. The original meaning (as seen in Goth. rūna) seems to be that of mystery, secret conversation; and the word is by some connected with Gr. εὑρηνάς, to inquire. Grimm and Mone derive it from O. Sax. runen, to scratch, cut—the letters being scratched or cut in sticks.] 1. A letter of the alphabet peculiar to the ancient northern nations of Europe. There were three leading classes of runes—the Scandinavian, the German,

The characters are formed almost entirely of straight lines, either single or in composition. Various opinions are held in regard to the origin of the runes. The resemblance of some of the runic characters to the Phœnician alphabet has led some to suppose they were introduced by the Phœnicians in their trading excursions. But most persons now believe them to be based on the Greek or the Latin alphabet. The priests kept the knowledge of the runes as much as possible a mystery, and cut them on pieces of smoothed wood, generally willow, called (in A. Sax.) rūn-stafas, which they used for the purpose of sorcery. Runes were inscribed on monuments, rocks, medals, rings, hilts and blades of swords, and the like. Runic monuments occur in Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Britain, Germany, and some parts of France and Spain. Three fine examples of Anglo-Saxon runic monuments occur at Bewcastle Cross, Cumberland; Hartlepool, Northumberland; and Ruthwell, Dumfriesshire.—2. pl. Rhymes or poetry or other matter expressed in the runic characters. 3. Rupellary (rö-pel-la-ri), a. [L. rupes, a rock.] Rocky.

In this rupellary nidary do the fowl lay eggs and breed. Evelyn.

Rupert's Drop (rö-pérts drop), n. A drop of glass thrown while in a state of fusion into water, and thus suddenly consolidated, taking generally a form somewhat like a tadpole. The thick end may be subjected to the smart blow of a hammer without breaking, but should the smallest part of the tail be nipped off, or the surface scratched with a diamond, the whole flies into fine dust with an almost explosive force. This phenomenon is due to the state of strain in the interior of the mass of glass, caused by the sudden consolidation of the crust which is formed while the internal mass is still liquid. This tends to contract on cooling, but is prevented by the molecular forces which attach it to the crust. This philosophical toy receives its name from being invented or brought first into notice by Prince Rupert, nephew of Charles I.

Rupia (rö-pi-a), n. [Gr. rhypos, flth.] A skin disease, consisting of an eruption of small flattened and distinct vesicles, surrounded by inflamed areole, containing a serous, purulent, sanious, or dark bloody fluid, and followed by thick, dark-coloured Rurigenoust† (rŏ'rij-en-us), a. [L. rus, ruis, the country, and gignor, to be born.] Born in the country. Bailey.

Rusa (rŏ'za), n. [Malay rusa, a stag.] A genus of Cervidæ, or sub-genus of Cervus, containing several species of deer, natives of the forests of India and the Eastern Archipelago. They may be described as large stags with round antlers, having an anterior basal snag, and the top forked, but the antlers not otherwise branched. The great rusa (R. hippelaphus), supposed by some to be the hippelaphus of Aristotle, is a native of Java, Sumatra, &c.; it has brown, rough hair, the neck in the male being covered with a mane. The sambur or sambar of India (R. Aristotelis) is a similarly powerful animal, having a sooty brown coat and a long mane. See SAMBUR.

Ruscus (rus'kus), n. [L. ruscum, butcher's-broom.] A small genus of plants, nat. order Liliaceæ, section Asparagæ, and known by the common name of butcher's-broom. The species of this genus are evergreen, and on this account are frequently introduced for undergrowth in shrubberies. The leaves are reduced to minute scales, the apparent foliage being small leaf-like branches, on the face of which the small yellowish flowers are often borne. R. aculeatus (common butcher's-broom) is found wild in Britain.

Ruse (rŏz), n. [Fr. ruse, from ruser, to dodge; O. Fr. reuser, to get out of the way; Pr. reisar; from L. recusare, to refuse.] An artifice, trick, or stratagem; a wile. 'The wiles and ruses which these timid creatures use to save themselves.' Ray.—Ruse de guerre, a trick of war; a stratagem.

Rush (rush), n. [O. E. rishe, ryshe, rusche, reshe; A. Sax. risce, rice, Sc. rash, a rush; D. rusch, G. rausch; comp. L. ruscum, butcher's-broom.] 1. The common name of the species of Juncus, a genus of plants, nat. order Juncaceæ. The genus is distinguished by its inferior perianth, composed of six glumaceous leaves; its three-celled, three-valved capsules; the seed-bearing dissepiments of the valves being in their middle. The species are numerous, and found chiefly in moist boggy situations in the colder parts of the world. (See JUNCACEÆ and JUNCUS.) About twenty species of rush are enumerated by British botanists. Various species are frequently very troublesome weeds in agriculture. The term rush is also applied to plants of various other genera beside Juncus, and by no means to all of the genus Juncus. Rushes were formerly used to strew floors by way of carpets; thus, Shakespeare says:

Let wantons light of heart
Tickle the senseless rushes with their heels.

2. Used typically of anything weak, worthless, or of trivial value; the merest trifle; a straw. 'Hews down oaks with rushes.' Shak.

John Bull's friendship is not worth a rush.

Rush (rush), v. i. [A word of somewhat doubtful pedigree, and probably arising from more than one word blended together, as A. Sax. hreoðan, to rush, to fall, hryslan, and hriscian, to shake; comp. Dan. ruske, Sw. ruska, to shake; D. ruischen, G. rauschen, to rustle, to sound as the wind in the bushes. The word was formerly transitive as well as intransitive.] 1. To move or drive forward with impetuosity, violence, and tumultuous rapidity; as, armies rush to battle; waters rush down a precipice; winds rush through the forest.

They all rush by and leave you. Shak.

The combat deepens; on, ye brave,
Who rush to glory or the grave. Campbell.

2. To hasten, hurry, or show undue eagerness; to act hastily and without due deliberation; as, to rush into speculation.

Rush (rush), v. t. 1. To push forward with violence; to force on hurriedly.—2. To master, secure, or get the better of by a rush.

Rush (rush), n. 1. A driving forward with eagerness and haste; a violent motion or course; as, a rush of troops; a rush of winds. 'The shrieking rush of the wainscot mouse.' Tennyson.—2. An eager demand; a run; as, there is a rush upon that commodity.

Rush-bearing (rush'bār-ing), a. Bearing or producing rushes.

Rush-bearing (rush'bār-ing), n. A name in some parts of England for the country wake or Feast of Dedication, when the parishioners strewed the church with rushes and sweet-smelling flowers.

Russophilism (rus-of-il-izm), n. The doctrines, sentiments, or principles of a Russophile.

Russophobia (rus-o-fö'bi-a), n. [Russ. and Gr. phobos, fear.] A dread of Russia or of her policy; a strong feeling against Russia or the Russians.

Russophobic (rus-of-ob-ist), n. One who dreads the Russians or their policy; one whose feelings are strongly against Russia, her people, or policy.

Russud (rus'ud), n. In the East Indies, a progressively increasing land-tax.

Rust (rust), n. [A. Sax. rust, rust, rustiness; cog. D. roest, Dan. rust, Sw. and G. rost, Icel. ryð (ryth), so called from its red colour, the root being that of red, ruddy, L. ruber, red (whence rubigo, rust), russus, reddish. See RUSSET.] 1. The red or orange-yellow coating which is formed on the surface of iron, when exposed to air and moisture. It is an oxide of iron, and in point of fact other metallic oxides may be considered as rusts of the peculiar metals on which they are formed, but the term rust in the common acceptance is limited to the red oxide or peroxide of iron. Oil-paint, varnish, plumbago, a film of caoutchouc, or a coating of tin may be employed, according to circumstances, to prevent the rusting of iron utensils.—2. A composition of iron- filings and sal-ammoniac, with sometimes a little sulphur, moistened with water and used for filling fast joints. Oxidation rapidly sets in, and the composition, after a time, becomes very hard, and takes thorough hold of the surfaces between which it is placed. A joint formed in this way is called a rust-joint.—3. That which resembles rust in appearance or effects, as (a) a parasitic fungus (Uredo rubigo vera), which attacks the leaves, glumes, stalks, &c., of cereals and grasses, showing itself in the form of orange and brown spots and blotches breaking out from the internal tissue of the plant. It is most common on barley, wheat, oats, and many pasture grasses. (b) Any foul extraneous matter; corrosive or injurious accretion or influence.

A haunted house,
That keeps the rust of murder on the walls. Tennyson.

Rust is used in some self-explanatory compound words; as, rust-coloured, rust-eaten, and the like.

Rust (rust), v.i. [From the noun.] 1. To contract or gather rust; to be oxidized.

Our armours now may rust. Dryden.

2. To assume an appearance as if coated with rust.

But when the bracken rusted on their crags,
My suit had withered. Tennyson.

3. To degenerate in idleness; to become dull by inaction.

Must I rust in Egypt, never more Appear in arms and be the chief of Greece? Dryden.

Rust (rust), v.t. 1. To cause to contract rust.

Keep up your bright swords, for the dew will rust them. Shak.

2. To impair by time and inactivity.

Rustful (rust'ful), a. Rusty; tending to produce rust; characterized by rust. 'Rustful sloth.' Quarles.

Rustic (rust'ik), a. [L. rusticus, from rus, the country.] 1. Pertaining to the country; living in or found in the country; rural; as, the rustic gods of antiquity. 'Our rustic revelry.' Shak.

And many a holy text around she strews,
That teach the rustic moralist to die. Gray.

2. Rude; unpolished; rough; awkward; as, rustic manners or behaviour.—3. Coarse; plain; simple; not elegant, refined, or costly; as, rustic entertainment; rustic dress.

4. Simple; honest; artless; unsophisticated.—Rustic coins or rustic coins, the stones which form the external angles of a building when they project beyond the general surface of the walls.—Rustic work, in a building, is when the stones, &c., in the face of it are hacked or picked in holes, so as to give them a natural rough appearance. This sort of work is however now more usually called rock-work, and the term rustic is applied to masonry worked with grooves between the courses, to look like open joints, of which there are several varieties. The same term is applied to walls built of stones of different sizes and shapes. In woodwork the term is used to designate summer houses and garden furniture made from rough limbs of trees, and arranged in fanciful forms.—SYN. Rural, country, rude, unpolished, inelegant, untalented, awkward, rough, coarse, plain, unadorned, simple, artless, honest.

1. With chamfered joints. 2. With rectangular joints.

Rustic (rust'ik), n. An inhabitant of the country; a clown; a swain. 'Hence to your fields, ye rustics!' Pope.

Rustical (rust'ik-al), n. A rustic. 'Entreat you not to be wroth with this rustical.' Sir W. Scott.

Rustically (rust'ik-al-i), adv. In a rustic manner; rudely; coarsely; without refinement or elegance.

The pulp style of Germany has been always rustically negligent, or bristling with pedantry. De Quincy.

Rusticalness (rust'ik-al-nes), n. The quality of being rustic; rudeness; coarseness; want of refinement.

Rusticate (rus'ti-kät), v.i. [L. rusticor, rusticatus, from rus, the country.] To dwell or reside in the country.

My lady Scudamore, from having rusticated in your company too long, pretends to open her eyes for the sake of seeing the sun, and to sleep because it is night. Pope.

Rusticate (rus'ti-kät), v.t. pret. & pp. rusticated; ppr. rusticating. To compel to reside in the country; to send to the country; specifically, to suspend from studies at a college or university and send away for a time by way of punishment. See RUSTICATION.

James, then a hobbadehoy, was now become a young man, having had the benefit of a university education, and acquired the inestimable polish which is gained by living in a fast set at a small college, and contracting debts and being rusticated and being plucked. Thackeray.

Rusticated (rus'ti-kät-ed), a. In building, same as Rustic. See under RUSTIC.

Rustication (rus'ti-kä'shon), n. 1. The act of rusticating, or the state of being rusticated; residence in the country. In the universities and colleges, the punishment of a student for some offence, by compelling him to leave the institution and reside for a time in the country.—2. In arch. that species of building called rustic work. See under RUSTIC.

Rustical (rus'ti-shal), a. Rustic; homely. 'The plain and rustical discourse of our fathers.' Sir W. Scott.

Rusticity (rus'-his'-i-ti), n. [L. rusticitas, from rusticus. See under RUSTIC.] The state or quality of being rustic; smack of country life; rustic manners; rudeness; coarseness; simplicity; artlessness.

The truth of it is, the sweetness and rusticity of a pastoral cannot be so well expressed in any other tongue as in the Greek, when rightly mixed and qualified by the Doric dialect. Addison.

The Saxons were refined from their rusticity. Sir W. Scott.

Rustily (rust'i-li), adv. In a rusty state; in a manner to suggest rustiness.

Lowten was in conversation with a rustily-clad, miserable man, in boots without toes, and gloves without fingers. Dickens.

Rustiness (rust'i-nes), n. The state of being rusty. Johnson.

Rust-joint (rust'joint), n. See under RUST.

Rustle (rust'l), v.i. pret. & pp. rustled; ppr. rustling. [A. Sax. hrístian, to rustle, a dim. freq. form as if from the Scandinavian verb: Icel. hrístia, Dan. ryste, Sw. rysta, to shake, to tremble.] To make a quick succession of small sounds, like the rubbing of silk cloth or dry leaves; to give out a slightly sibilant sound when shaken; as, a rustling silk; rustling leaves or trees; rustling wings. 'Rustling in unpaid-for silks.' Shak.

'He is coming, I hear the straw rustle.' Shak.

Rustle (rust'l), n. The noise made by one who or that which rustles; a rustling.

Rustle (rust'l), v.t. To cause to rustle.

The wind was scarcely strong enough to rustle the leaves around. T. C. Cratton.

Rustler (rus'tl-ér), n. One who rustles.

Rustre (rus'tér), n. [Fr.] In her, a lozenge, pierced, round in the centre, the field appearing through it.

Rusty (rust'i), a. 1. Covered or affected with rust; as, a rusty knife or sword.—2. Having the colour of rust; appearing as if covered with a substance resembling rust; rubiginous; as, rusty wheat.—3. Dull; impaired by inaction or neglect of use; rusted; as, to become rusty on a subject.

Hector in his dull and long-continued truce
Is rusty grown. Shak.

4. Ill-natured; surly; morose; contumacious; insubordinate. [Slang.]

He takes her round the neck, and tries to pull her down, and if then she turns rusty, he's good to go behind her. Mayhew.

—To ride rusty, to be contumaciously or surlyly insubordinate or insolent; to resist or refuse to obey, with surliness or violence.

And how the devil am I to get the crew to obey me? Why, even Dick Fletcher rides rusty on me now and then. Sir W. Scott.

Rusty-dab (rust'i-dab), n. The popular name of a flat-fish of the genus Platessa, found on the coast of Massachusetts and New York in deep water.

Rut (rut), n. [Fr. rut, O. Fr. ruit, the noise which deer make when they desire to come together, from L. rugitus, a roaring, from rugio, to roar, to bellow.] The copulation of deer and some other animals; the time during which they are under the sexual excitement.

Rut (rut), v.i. To desire to come together for copulation; said of deer.

Rut (rut), v.t. To cover in copulation.

Rut (rut), n. [O. Fr. rote, Mod. Fr. route, Sc. rot, rit, a line drawn on the soil as a guide in planting. See ROUTE.] 1. The track of a wheel.—2. A line cut on the soil with a spade.

Rut (rut), v.t. pret. & pp. rutted; ppr. rutting. 1. To make ruts in or on with cart-wheels.—2. To cut a line on, as on the soil, with a spade.

Ruta (rô'ta), n. [L.] A genus of plants, the type of the order Rutaceæ. See RUE and RUTACEÆ.

Rutabaga (rô'ta-bâ'ga), n. The Swedish turnip, or Brassica campestris.

Rutaceæ (rô'tâ'sé-ê), n. pl. [From L. ruta, ruæ.] A nat. order of polypetalous exogens. They are shrubs or trees, rarely herbs, the simple or compound leaves dotted with glands, often having a strong heavy smell. About 650 species are known, occurring most abundantly in Australia and South Africa. The diosmas or buchu plants of the Cape are well known for their powerful and usually offensive odour; they are recommended as antispasmodics. A South American species produces the Angostura-bark. The bark of one of the quinas of Brazil, the Ticoorea febrifuga, is a powerful medicine in intermittent fevers. Dictamnus abounds in volatile oil to such a degree that the atmosphere surrounding it actually becomes inflammable in hot weather.

Rutaceous (rô'tâ'shus), a. Of or belonging to or resembling plants of the nat. order Rutaceæ.

Rute (rôt), n. A miner's term for very small threads of ore.

Rutelidæ (rô'tel'i-dê), n. pl. The tree-beetles, a group of beetles allied to Melolonthidæ and Cetoniadæ. The body is shorter, rounder, and more polished than in the Scarabæidæ, and the head and thorax are closely united. With few exceptions they belong to the warmer parts of America. One of the most common and most beautiful of the group is the goldsmith's-beetle (Areola lanigera). It is about $\frac{3}{8}$ inch in length, of a lemon-yellow colour above, the top of the head and thorax glittering like gold. In Massachusetts they appear about the middle of May, flying with a humming or rustling sound among the branches of the trees, the young leaves of which they devour.

Ruth (rôth), n. [From rue; comp. truth from true.] 1. Mercy; pity; tenderness; sorrow for the misery of another; sorrowful or tender regret. 'Looking with pretty ruth upon my pain.' Shak. [Now mainly poetical.]

Ruth began to work

Against his anger in him. Tennyson.

Checks in which was yet a rose

Of perished summers, like a rose in a book

Kept more for ruth than pleasure.

E. B. Browning.

2. Misery; sorrow. Spenser.

Rutha (rut'a), n. [Skr. ratha, a chariot.] In the East Indies, a carriage on two low wheels, and sometimes highly ornamented.

Rutishness (rut'ish-nes), n. The state or quality of being rutlish.

Ruttle (rut'l), n. Rattle: rare, except as applied to the death-rattle. 'The last agonies, the fixed eyes, and the dismal ruttle.' Burnet.

Rutty (rut'i), a. Full of ruts; cut by wheels. 'The road was rutty.' C. Roveraft.

Rutty (rut'i), a. Rooty; full of roots. Spenser.

Ryacolite (ri-ak'ô-lit), n. [G. ryaz, a stream, and lithos, a stone.] A name given to glossy felspar.

Ryal (ri'al), n. A coin. See RIAL.

Rye (ri), n. [A. Sax. ryge; Icel. rúgr, Dan. rug, Sw. rog, D. rogge, G. roggen, rocken. Similar forms also appear in Celtic and Slavonic, but how far borrowing has taken place is doubtful.] 1. A plant of the genus Secale, the S. cereale, nat. order Gramineæ. It is an esculent grain which bears naked seeds on a flat ear, furnished with awns like barley. It has been cultivated from time immemorial, and is considered as coming nearer in its properties to wheat than any other grain. It is more common than wheat in many parts of the Continent, being a more certain crop, and requiring less culture and manure. It is the bread-corn of Germany and Russia. It was formerly raised in considerable quantities as a bread-corn in England, but now it is mostly sown as a green-crop for food to sheep and cattle in spring. In the Netherlands it is the chief grain from which the spirit called Hollands is distilled, and when malted it makes excellent beer. Two parts of wheat and one of rye ground together make an excellent bread. Rye straw is useless as fodder, but forms an excellent material for thatching. It is also used for stuffing horse-collars or mattresses, and for making straw hats and bonnets. The meal of rye differs from that of wheat in containing a much smaller proportion of gluten.—Spurred rye, rye affected with ergot. See ERGOT.—2. A disease in a hawk.

Rye-grass (ri'gras), n. One of the most common of the artificial grasses, belonging to the genus Lolium. There are several varieties, some annual, others perennial; some producing a strong juicy grass, and others a small diminutive plant. In the present system of husbandry rye-grass performs a very essential part, especially the perennial sort, which, mixed with different varieties of clover and other grass-seeds, produces a rich and close herbage, which may be either mown for hay or depastured. Called also Ray-grass.

Ryke (rÿk), v.i. To reach. [Scotch.]

Let me ryke up to dight that tear. Burns.

Rynchops (ring'kops), n. See RHYNCHOPS.

Rynd (rind), n. A strong piece of iron inserted in the hole in the centre of the upper and moving millstone in corn-mills. The upper end of the spindle, which passes through the nether millstone, and which is driven by the machinery, is fixed into the rynd, and thus gives motion to the upper millstone.

Ryot (ri'ôt), n. [Ar. ri'iyat, the governed, a subject, a peasant.] A Hindu cultivator of the soil, or peasant, who holds land under the mode of assessment termed ryotwar.

Ryotwar (ri'ôt-wâr), n. [Hind. See RYOT.] The stipulated arrangement in regard to rent made annually in parts of Hindustan, especially in the Madras Presidency, by government officials with the ryots or actual cultivators of the soil, without the intervention of middlemen.

Ryth (rith), n. A ford.

Rytina (ri-ti'na), n. Same as Rhytina.

S.

S, the nineteenth letter of the English alphabet, represents a hissing sound made by emitting the breath between the roof of the mouth and the tip of the tongue placed just above the upper teeth. It may be reckoned among the linguals (as the tongue is essential in its pronunciation), and also among the dentals (as the teeth co-operate in producing the hissing sound). More descriptively it is classed as a sibilant, from its hissing sound. Properly speaking, two sounds belong to this character in English, the one surd, or uttered with breath merely, the other sonant, or uttered with voice. The first is a mere hissing, like c soft, as in sack, sin, this, thus; the other is a hissing accompanied by a vocal murmur, precisely like that of z, as in muse, wise, pronounced müze, wîze. S generally has its hissing sound at the beginning of all proper English words, but in the middle and end of words its sound is to be known only by usage. In a few words it is silent, as in isle and viscount. S is closely allied to r, and there are many instances of its change into that letter. (See R.) In some words ce is now written for a former s or es, as in mice, hence, whence, once. Along with a following h it forms a digraph representing a distinct sound, which, like that of ch, is comparatively modern, being a weakening of an older and stronger sound, sc (sk). This sound is now very common in English words, both initially and finally, as in shape (A. Sax. scapan), sheath (A. Sax. scæth), ship (A. Sax. scip), fish (A. Sax. fisc), ash (A. Sax. æsc), &c. Formerly sc and sp were often transposed to cs and ps; thus O. E. æsc = ash; clapsed = clapsed, lipped = lipped. S is an exceedingly common letter in English words, both initially and finally, singly or in conjunction with other consonants. The chief initial combinations ch, chain; ch, Sc. loch; g, go; j, job;

h, Fr. ton; ng, sing; TH, then; th, thin;

w, wig; wh, whig; zh, azure.—See KEY.

in which it appears are sm, sn, sp, and st (as in small, snow, spring, strong); st and sp are common also as final combinations. In some cases a final t has been tacked on to a word ending properly in s, as in amongst, midst, whilst, behest, no doubt owing to the frequency with which this combination occurs. It is often doubled, and as the second element in a combination it may appear finally after any of the consonants except ch, sh, z. One reason for its being so common is that it is the characteristic of the plural and other inflections.—In abbreviations S stands for various words; as, F.R.S. Fellow of the Royal Society; S.T.P. for Sanctæ Theologiæ Professor, Professor of Sacred Theology; its most common use as an abbreviation is for south; S. E. south-east; S. W. south-west, &c.—In chem. S is the symbol for sulphur.

Saadh (sā'd), n. [Hind. sad'ha, pure.] One of an Indian sect of pure deists, whose mode of life in many respects resembles those of the Quakers.

Sabadilla (sab-a-dil'a), See CREVADILLA.

Sabeian (sa-bē'an), n. Same as Sabian.

Sabeianism (sa-bē'an-izm), n. Same as Sabæism and Sabianism.

Sabæism, Sabaism (sā'bē-izm, sā'ba-izm), See SABIANISM.

Sabal (sā'bal), n. A genus of palms, natives of the tropics, and next to Chamerops the most northern genus of Palmae. Some of them are lofty trees, but one, the S. Palmetto, is perhaps the smallest of all the palm tribe. The leaves of S. Adamsoni, as well as those of S. Palmetto and S. Mexicana, are used for making hats and mats.

Sabaoth (sa-bā'oth), n. [Heb. tsabōth, armies, from tsabā, to assemble, to go forth to war, to fight.] 1. In Scip. armies; hosts. 'The Lord of Sabaoth.' Rom. ix. 29; Jam. v. 4. 2. Erroneously used as synonymous with Sabbath. Spenser. 'Sacred and inspired Divinity, the Sabaoth and port of all men's labours and peregrinations.' Bacon. 'A week, aye the space between two Sabaoths.' Sir W. Scott. Sir Walter Scott adopts this old usage no doubt for artistic reasons.

Sabathian, Sabathian (sa-bā'thi-an), n. A member of a religious sect of the seventeenth century, followers of Sabbathius Zwi, a native of Smyrna, who declared himself to be the Messiah, who had been sent to shake off the thralldom both of Christianity and Mohammedanism from the Jews, and to convert all humanity. Remnants of the sect are still in existence in Poland and Turkey.

Sabbatarian (sab-ba-tā'ri-an), n. [From Sabbath.] 1. One who observes the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath, instead of the first. A sect of Baptists are called Sabbatarians, or Seventh-day Baptists, because they maintain that the Jewish Sabbath has not been abrogated.—2. One who observes the Sabbath with extraordinary or unreasonable rigour; one careful to abstain from work or relaxation on Sunday.

We have myriads of examples in this kind, amongst those rigid Sabbatarians. Burton.

Sabbatarian (sab-ba-tā'ri-an), a. Of or belonging to Sabbatarians or their tenets or practices; pertaining to the rigid observance of the Sabbath.

The form in which this tendency shows itself in her is by a strict observance of Sabbatarian rule. Dissipation and low dresses during the week are, under her control, atoned for by three services, an evening sermon read by herself, and a perfect abstinence from any cheering employment on a Sunday. Trotlope.

We almost hear Jesus call the poor beggar from the door, and bid him stand forth in the midst of the assembly, and penetrate the Sabbatarian spies by the puzzling question, 'is it lawful to do good on the sabbath day, or to do evil?' J. Martineau.

Sabbatarianism (sab-ba-tā'ri-an-izm), n. The tenets of Sabbatarians.

Sabbath (sab'bat), n. [Heb. shabbath, rest, the day of rest.] 1. The day which God appointed to be observed as a day of rest from all secular labour or employments, and to be kept holy and consecrated to his service and worship. This was originally the seventh day of the week, and this day is still observed by the Jews and some Christians as the Sabbath. But the Christian church very early began, and still continue, to observe the first day of the week, in commemoration of the resurrection of Christ on that day. Hence it is often called the Lord's-day. The heathen nations in the north of Europe dedicated the first day of the week to the sun, and hence their Christian descendants continue to call the day Sunday. Sabbath is not strictly synonymous with Sunday. Sunday is the mere name of the day; Sabbath is the name of the institution. Sunday is the Sabbath of Christians; Saturday is the Sabbath of the Jews. But in the mouths of many it is equivalent to Sunday.

Glad we returned up to the coasts of light
Ere Sabbath evening. Milton.

Hail, Sabbath! thee I hail, the poor man's day.

Sunday, however, is a word which never pollutes his mouth—it is always 'the Sabbath.' 'The desecration of the Sabbath,' as he delights to call it, is to him meat and drink. Trotlope.

2. Intermission of pain or sorrow; time of rest. 'The eternal Sabbath of his rest.' Dryden.

Peaceful sleep out the sabbath of the tomb,
And wake to raptures in a life to come. Pope.

Take thy banner! May it wave
Proudly o'er the good and brave;
When the battle's distant wall
Breaks the Sabbath of our vale. Longfellow.

3. The sabbatical year among the Israelites. Lev. xxv. 4. See under SABBATIC, SABBATICALLY.—Sabbath-day's journey, the distance which the Jews were permitted to travel on the Sabbath-day. It appears to have varied at different times and in different circumstances, but it was probably seldom more than the whole, or less than three-fourths, of a geographical mile. A space of 2000 ells on every side of a city belonged to it, and to go that distance beyond the walls was permitted as a Sabbath-day's journey. Smith's Dict. of the Bible.

Sabbath-breaker (sab'bat-brāk-ēr), n. One who breaks the Sabbath; one who profanes the Sabbath by violating the laws of God or man which enjoin the religious observance of that day.

The usurer is the greatest Sabbath-breaker, because his plough goeth every Sunday. Bacon.

Sabbath-breaking (sab'bat-brāk-ing), n. The act of breaking or profaning the Sabbath. Also used as an adjective: given to breaking the Sabbath.

Sabbathless (sab'bat-less), a. Having no Sabbath; without intermission of labour. 'Sabbathless Satan.' Lamb.

Sabbatia (sab-bā'ti-a), n. [In honour of Sabbati, an Italian botanist.] A genus of North American plants, nat. order Gentianaceae. There are several species, all characterized by the possession of a pure bitter principle, on which account they are extensively used in North America in intermittent and remittent fevers, and as tonics. They are annuals or biennials, with slender stems, opposite sessile entire simple leaves, and handsome cymose-panicled white or rose-purple flowers. The species most used is S. angularis, which grows in damp wet soils in the United States, and is common in moist meadows among high grass.

Sabbatic, Sabbatical (sab-bat'ik, sab-bat'ik-al), a. [Fr. sabbatique, L. sabbaticus. See SABBATH.] Pertaining to the Sabbath; resembling the Sabbath; enjoying or bringing an intermission of labour. 'Due attendance on Sabbatic duty.' Stukeley.—Sabbatical year, in the Jewish economy, was every seventh year, in which the Israelites were commanded to suffer their fields and vineyards to rest or lie without tillage and to release debtors from their obligations.

Sabbatism (sab'ba-tizm), n. [Gr. sabbatismos, from sabbatizo, to keep the Sabbath. See SABBATH.] Rest; intermission of labour. 'That Sabbatism or rest.' Dr. H. More.

Sabbatize (sab'ba-tiz), v. i. To keep the Sabbath, especially in a strict way.

Sabbaton (sab'ba-ton), n. [Akin to sabat.] A round-toed piece of armour covering the foot, worn in the sixteenth century.

Sabeian (sā-bē'an), See SABIAN.

Sabeism (sā'bē-izm), n. The same as Sabianism.

Sabella (sa-bel'a), n. A genus of tube-inhabiting, marine articulated annelids, belonging to the order Tubicola or Cephalobranchiata. The species are large, and their fanlike branchiæ or gills remarkable for their delicacy and brilliancy. The blood is of an olive-green colour. S. protula is a large and splendid species inhabiting the Mediterranean.

Sabellana (sa-bel-lā'na), n. [L. sabulum, gravel.] In geol. coarse sand or gravel.

Sabellaria (sa-bel-lā'ri-a), n. A sub-genus of Annelida or worms belonging to the order Tubicola. In this genus the tube in which the animal resides is formed of grains of sand cemented together.

Sabellian (sa-bel'i-an), a. Pertaining to the heresy of Sabellians. See SABELLIAN, n.

Sabellian (sa-bel'i-an), n. A follower of Sabellius, a philosopher of Egypt in the third century, who taught that there is one person only in the Godhead, and that the Word and Holy Spirit are only virtues, emanations, or functions of the Deity.

Sabellianism (sa-bel'i-an-izm), n. The doctrines or tenets of the Sabellians.

Saber (sā'bēr), n. American mode of spelling Sabre.

Sabia (sā'bi-a), n. A genus of plants, so called from the Indian name sabja of one of the species, and forming the type of the small order Sabiaceæ. There are about ten species, natives of tropical and eastern temperate Asia. The species form ornamental climbing shrubs, with smooth, lanceolate, alternate leaves, and axillary cymes or panicles of small greenish flowers.

Sabiaceæ (sā-bi-a'sē-ē), n. pl. A small order of dicotyledons, distributed into four genera, of which Sabia is Asiatic, Phoxanthus and Ophiocaryon American, and Meliosma common to both the Old and New Worlds.

Sabian (sā'bi-an), n. A native or inhabitant of that part of Arabia now called Yemen, the chief city of which was called Saba. They were extensive merchants of spices, perfumes, precious stones, &c., which they imported from India.

Sabian (sā'bi-an), a. Pertaining to Saba or its inhabitants. Written also Sabeaan, Sabeen.

Sabian (sā'bi-an), a. [Heb. tsābā, an army or host, especially the heavenly host of the angels and the heavenly luminaries.] Pertaining to the religion and rites of the Sabians. See SABIAN, n. Written also Sabeaan, Sabeen.

Sabian (sā'bi-an), n. [See above.] 1. A worshipper of the sun and other heavenly bodies.—2. One of an obscure sect, who mingled Christianity, Judaism, Mohammedanism, and heathenish superstition together. Adherents of this sect, inappropriately known as Christians of St. John, are still scattered in small numbers over the region lying about the Lower Euphrates and Tigris and other places.

3. One of a sect that arose in the ninth century, called also Pseudo-Sabians or Syrian Sabians. Their religion is described as the heathenism of the ancient Syrians, modified by Hellenic influences. Written also Sabeaan, Sabeen.

Sabianism (sā'bi-an-izm), n. The doctrines or systems of the various sects known as Sabians. See SABIAN. Written also Sabeaanism, Sabeism.

Sabicu (sab-i-kō'), n. [Native name.] The name of a tree belonging to the genus Lysiloma, the L. Sabicu, growing in Cuba. The wood is very hard and tough, and used for ship-building and other purposes. Called also Sabicu-wood, Savicu, and Savicu-wood.

Sabine (sā'bin), n. [Fr. sabine, savinier, from L. sabina (herba), the Sabine herb, savin.] A plant, Juniperus Sabina. Usually written Savin (which see).

Sabine (sā'bin), n. and a. One of, or pertaining to, an ancient people from whom the founders of Rome took their daughters by force, having invited them to some public sports or shows with this object. When the Sabines came to revenge this act of violence the women acted as mediators between their fathers and husbands, and succeeded in establishing lasting peace between them. The deed is known as the 'rape of the Sabine women.'

Sable (sā'bl), n. [O.Fr. sable, from Pol. sabol, Russ. sobot, a Slavonic word, whence Sable (Mustela zibellina).

also Sw. Dan. and D. sable.] 1. A digitigrade carnivorous mammal, nearly allied to the common marten and pine marten, the Mustela zibellina, found chiefly in the northern regions of Asia, and hunted for its fur. Its length, exclusive of the tail, is about 18 inches. Its fur, which is extremely lustrous, and hence of the very highest value, is generally brown, grayish-yellow on the throat, and with small grayish-yellow spots scattered on the sides of the neck. It is heaviest during winter, and owing to the mode of attachment of the hairs to the skin it may be pressed or smoothed in any direction. The hunting of the sable is attended by much difficulty and danger. This animal burrows in the earth or under trees, in winter and summer subsisting on small animals, and in autumn on berries. Two other species of sable are enumerated, the Japanese sable (M. melanopus), and a North American species (M. leucopus), which are similarly sought after and destroyed for their fur.—2. The fur of the sable.—3. A black or mourning suit or garment. 'Sables worn by destiny.' Young.—4. In her. black, one of the colours or tinctures employed in blazonry. In engraving it is expressed by perpendicular crossed by horizontal lines.

Sable.

Sacrament (sak'ra-men't), n. [L. sacramentum, a military oath of allegiance, an oath, from sacer, sacred.] 1. The military oath taken by every Roman soldier, by which he swore to obey his commander, and not desert his standard; hence, an oath or a ceremony producing an obligation. 'Here I begin the sacrament to all.' B. Jonson.—2. In theol. an outward and visible sign of inward and spiritual grace; or more particularly, a solemn religious ceremony enjoined by Christ, the head of the Christian church, to be observed by his followers, by which their special relation to him is created, or their obligations to him renewed and ratified. In the R. Cath. Ch. and the Greek Ch. it is held that there are seven sacraments, viz. baptism, confirmation, the eucharist, penance, extreme unction, holy orders, and matrimony. Protestants in general acknowledge but two sacraments, baptism and the Lord's supper. The former is called a sacrament, for by it persons are separated from the world, brought into Christ's visible church, and laid under particular obligations to obey his precepts. The latter is also a sacrament, for by commemorating the death and dying love of Christ, Christians avow their special relation to him, and renew their obligations to be faithful to their divine Master. When we use sacrament without any qualifying word we mean by it the eucharist or Lord's supper. 3. A sacred token or pledge; the pledge of a covenant.

God sometimes sent a light of fire, and a pillar of a cloud, . . . and the sacrament of a rainbow, to guide his people through their portion of sorrows. Fer. Taylor.

4. No longer dangerous; placed beyond the power of doing harm.

Banquo's safe.—Aye, my good lord, safe in a ditch. Shak.

5. Sound; whole; good. 'A trade that I may use with a safe conscience.' Shak.—Safe, Secure. In our present English the difference between these two words is hardly recognized, but a clear distinction was often made by some of our earlier writers: safe, implying free from danger or evil results; secure, free of care, careless, easy in mind.

We cannot endure to be disturbed or awakened from our pleasing lethargy. For we care not to be safe, but to be secure; not to escape hell, but to live pleasantly. Jer. Taylor.

Safe (säf), n. 1. A place of safety; specifically, (a) a strong case for containing money, jewels, account-books, and other valuable articles, to guard them from the attacks of burglars or against the action of fire. (b) A ventilated or refrigerated receptacle, in which meat is kept cool and fresh, and free from the attacks of noxious insects.—2.† A pantry.

Safe† (säf), v. t. To render safe. And that which most with you should safe my going Is Fulvia's death. Shak.

Safe-conduct (säf'kon-duk't), n. That which gives a safe passage; as, (a) a convoy or guard to protect a person in an enemy's country or in a foreign country; (b) a writing, a pass or warrant of security given to a person by the sovereign of a country to enable him to travel with safety.

Safe-conduct (säf'kon-duk't), v. t. To conduct or convoy safely; to give a safe passage to, especially through a hostile country, 'Safe-conducting the rebels for the ships.' Shak.

Safeguard (säf'gärd), n. 1. One who or that which defends or protects; defence; protection.

The smallest worm will turn, being trodden on, And doves will peck in safeguard of their brood. Shak.

The sword, the safeguard of thy brother's throne, Is now become the bulwark of thine own. Granville.

2. A convoy or guard to protect a traveller.

3. A passport; a warrant of security given by a sovereign to protect a stranger within his territories; formerly a protection granted to a stranger in prosecuting his rights in due course of law.

A trumpet was sent to the Earl of Essex for a safeguard or pass to two lords, to deliver a message from the king to the two houses. Glarendon.

4. An outer petticoat to save women's clothes on horseback. Beau. & Fl.

Safeguard (säf'gärd), v. t. To guard; to protect.

To safeguard thine own life. Shak. The best way is to venge my Gloster's death. Shak.

Safe-keeping (säf'këp-ing), n. The act of keeping or preserving in safety from injury or from escape; secure guardianship; as, I shall leave it in your safe-keeping.

Safely (säf'li), adv. In a safe manner: (a) without incurring danger or hazard of evil consequences.

All keep aloof, and safely shout around. Dryden.

(b) Without hurt or injury; in safety. 'That my ships are safely come to road.' Shak.

The remnant of his days he safely past. Prior.

(c) In close custody; securely; carefully.

Till then I'll keep him dark and safely locked. Shak.

Safeness (säf'nes), n. The condition or quality of being safe; the state of being safe or of conferring safety; freedom from danger; as, the safeness of an experiment; the safeness of a bridge or of a boat.

Safe-pledge (säf'plëj), n. In law, a surety appointed for one's appearance at a day assigned.

Safety (säf'ti), n. 1. The state or quality of being safe or uninjured; exemption from hurt, injury, or loss; as, to escape dangers in safety. 'Hath passed in safety through the narrow seas.' Shak.—2. The state of not being liable to danger or injury; a state or condition out of harm's way; freedom from danger; preservation; as, here you are in perfect safety; you may do it with all safety; to run to a cave for safety; to provide for one's own safety.

Would I were in an ale-house in London! I would give all my fame for a pot of ale and safety. Shak. Sometimes used in plural.

Let not my jealousies be your dishonours, But mine own safeties. Shak.

3. The state or quality of not causing danger; safeness; the quality of making safe or secure, or of inspiring confidence, justifying trust, ensuring against harm, loss, or the like; as, the safety of an electric experiment.

Would there were any safety in thy sex, That I might put a thousand sorrows off, And credit thy repentance. Beau. & Fl.

4. Preservation from escape; close custody.

Imprison him; Deliver him to safety and return. Shak.

Safety-arch (säf'ti-ärch), n. Same as Discharging-arch.

Safety-beam (säf'ti-bëm), n. In rail, a beam of a truck frame furnished with straps passing around to prevent dangerous contingencies, by retaining the parts in their proper relative positions in case of the axle breaking.

Safety-belt (säf'ti-bëlt), n. A belt made of some buoyant material or inflated to sustain a person in water; a life-belt; a safety-buoy.

Safety-buoy (säf'ti-boi), n. A safety-belt.

Safety-cage (säf'ti-käi), n. A cage for raising and lowering miners. It travels upon guides of wood or iron fixed against the sides of the shaft, and is fitted with levers and catches, so that in the event of a rope breaking the levers or catches fly out, and either press against the guides or clip them, by which the cage is prevented from falling.

Safety-fuse (säf'ti-füz), n. A fuse used in blasting operations, consisting generally of a hollow cord of spun yarn, tarred on the outside to render it water-proof, and filled with tightly rammed gunpowder. Such fuses are made to burn at a certain rate (say 2 feet) per minute, so that the time elapsing between the igniting of the fuse and the desired explosion can be easily determined. A gutta-percha fuse-tube is sometimes used in cases of blasting under water.

Safety-lamp (säf'ti-lamp), n. A lamp for lighting coal-mines without exposing workmen to the explosion of fire-damp. It consists of a cistern for holding the oil, in the top of which the wick is placed. Over the cistern is placed a cylinder of wire-gauze, so as to envelope the flame. By this contrivance light is transmitted to the miner without endangering the kindling of the atmosphere of fire-damp which may surround him; because the heat of the flame is decreased so much in passing through the wire gauze that it is incapable of igniting the inflammable gas (carburetted hydrogen) outside. In some forms of the lamp a glass cylinder is placed inside the gauze cage; this resists air currents and ensures a steadier light.

Safety-lintel (săf'ti-lin-tel), n. A name given to the wooden lintel which is placed behind a stone lintel in the aperture of a door or window.

Safety-pin (săf'ti-pin), n. A pin having its point fitting into a kind of sheath, so that it may not be readily withdrawn or prick the wearer or others while in use.

Safety-plug (săf'ti-plug), n. In steam-boilers, a bolt having its centre filled with a fusible metal screwed into the top of the fire-box, so that when the water becomes too low the increased temperature melts out the metal, and thus admits the water to put the fire out, and save the tubes and fire-box from injury by too great heat.

Safety-tube (săf'ti-tüb), n. An arrangement adapted to a gas-generating vessel, to prevent the liquid into which the delivery tube dips from passing back into the vessel in consequence of diminished internal pressure. The simplest form consists of a straight tube passing through the cork of the generating vessel and dipping below the surface of the liquid, or of a tube bent twice at right angles, passing just through the cork, so that a portion of liquid may remain in the lower bend and form a liquid joint, cutting off the communication between the inside of the vessel and the external air.

Safety-valve (săf'ti-valv), n. A contrivance for obviating or diminishing the risk of explosions in steam-boilers. The form and construction of safety-valves are exceedingly various, but the principle of all is the same: that of opposing the pressure within the boiler by such a force as will yield before it reaches the point of danger, and permit the steam to escape. The most simple and obvious kind of safety-valve is that in which a weight is placed directly over a steam-tight plate, fitted to an aperture in the boiler. When, however, the pressure is high, this form becomes inconvenient, and the lever safety-valve is adopted. This form is represented in fig. 1, where a is the valve, fitted to move vertically, and guided by a stem passing through the seat; b, the boiler; c, the valve-seat, usually, as well as the valve itself, formed of gun-metal (the same letters indicate the corresponding parts in fig. 2); d, the lever, working upon a fixed centre at e, and pressing upon the valve by a steel point; f is a guide for the lever, and g a weight which may be adjusted to any distance from the centre, according to the pressure required. In locomotive engines, where the lever and weight would occupy too much space, it is usual to adopt the spring safety-valve, one form of which is shown at fig. 2. A series of bent springs, h h h, are placed alternately in opposite directions, their extremities sliding upon the rods i i, and are forced down upon the valve a by means of a cross bar k, which may be adjusted by means of the nut so as to give the right pressure upon the valve.

Safflower (săf'flō), n. Same as Safflower.

An herb they call safflow, or bastard saffron, dyers use for scarlet. Mortimer.

Safflower (săf'flou-ēr), n. [From saffron and flower; comp. G. safflor.] Bastard saffron, a composite plant of the genus Carthamus, the C. tinctorius. It is cultivated in China, India, Egypt, and also in the south of Europe, on account of its flowers, which in their dried state form the safflower of commerce. An oil is expressed from the seeds, which is used by the Asiatics as a laxative medicine. It is also most extensively used as a lamp-oil. The dried flowers afford two colouring matters (also called safflower), a yellow and a red, the latter (carthamine) being that for which they are most valued. They are chiefly used for dyeing silk, affording various shades of pink, rose, crimson, and scarlet. Mixed with finely-powdered talc, safflower forms a common variety of rouge. It is also used for adulterating saffron, a much more expensive dye-stuff.

Saffron (săf'ron), n. [Fr. safran, from Sp. azafrano, from Ar. and Per. zaferān, saffron; with the article, az-zaferān. The plant was cultivated by the Moors in Spain.] A plant of the genus Crocus, the C. sativus. It is a low ornamental plant, with grass-like leaves and large crocus-like flowers of a purple colour. It is a native of Greece and Asia Minor, but extensively cultivated in Austria, France, Spain, and also formerly in England. The dried stigmata form the saffron of the shops, which, when good, has a sweetish, penetrating, diffusive odour; a warm, pungent, bitterish taste; and a rich deep orange colour. Saffron is employed, especially on the Continent, as a colouring and flavouring ingredient in culinary preparations, liqueurs, &c.; in medicine it is now only applied for similar purposes, but formerly it was considered to possess stimulant, emmenagogue, cordial, and antispasmodic properties. It gives to water and alcohol about three-fourths of its weight of an orange-red extract, which is largely employed in painting and dyeing. It is often adulterated with the petals of other plants, especially with those of the safflower and marigold. The name bastard saffron is given to safflower; meadow-saffron is Colchicum autumnale; hay-saffron consists of the stigmas of the Crocus sativus, with part of the style, carefully dried; and cake-saffron, of cakes made of safflower and gum-water.

Saffron (săf'ron), a. Having the rich orange colour of saffron; yellow. 'Saffron flame.' Chapman. Did this companion with the saffron face Revel and feast it at my house to-day. Shak. Aurora now had left her saffron bed. Dryden.

Saffron (săf'ron), v.t. To tinge with saffron; to make yellow; to gild.

Saffron (săf'ron), a. Having the colour of saffron.

The woman was of complexion yellowish or saffron, as on whose face the sun had too freely cast his beams. Lord.

Sag (săg), v.i. pret. sagged; ppr. sagging. [Sc. seg, to sink, to subside, perhaps from A. Sax. stigan, to sink; allied to L.G. sacken, D. zakken, to sink down.] 1. To sink, incline, or hang away owing to insufficiently supported weight; to settle; to sink in the middle; as, a building sags to the north or south; the door sags; a beam sags by means of its weight.

Safflower (Carthamus tinctorius).

The party returned home as it came, all tired and happy, excepting little Alfred, who was tired and cross, and sat sleepy and sagging on his father's knee. Longfellow.

Hence—2. To yield under the pressure of care, difficulties, trouble, doubt, or the like; to become unsettled or unbalanced; to waver or fluctuate.

The mind I sway by, and the heart I bear, Shall never sag with doubt, nor shake with fear. Shak.

3. Naut. to incline to the leeward; to make leeway.

Sag (săg), v.t. To cause to bend or give way; to load or burden.

Sag (săg), n. The state or act of sinking, bending, or sagging.

Saga (să'ga), n. [Icel. saga, a tale, a history; from segja, E. to say. See SAY.] An ancient Scandinavian legend or tradition of considerable length, relating either mythical or historical events; a tale; a history; as, the Völsunga saga; the Knytinga saga, &c.

And thus had Harold, in his youth, Lear'd many a saga's rhyme uncouth— Of that sea-snake tremendous curl'd, Whose monstrous circle girds the world. Sir W. Scott.

And then the blue-eyed Norseman told A saga of the days of old. Longfellow.

In the true Saga age the Icelanders had no 'habit of writing'; they simply told their stories, which were handed down with scrupulous fidelity by word of mouth, and without the use of either pen or ink. When the art of writing came in, the true Saga period perished. Just as the printing press extinguished manuscripts, so did manuscripts extinguish Sagas in Iceland and the North. Edin. Rev.

Sagacious (sa-gă'shūs), a. [L. sagax, sagacis, keen-scented, acute, sagacious, from sagis, to perceive keenly, from a root signifying to be sharp, seen in Gr. sagaris, a battle-axe, and Skr. saghnōti, to kill.] 1. Quick of scent; able to scent or perceive by the senses.

So scented the grim Feature, and upturn'd His nostril wide into the murky air; Sagacious of his quarry from so far. Milton.

2. Intellectually keen or quick; acute in discernment or penetration; discerning and judicious; shrewd; as, a sagacious mind.

Only sagacious heads light on these observations. Locke.

3. Full of or informed by wisdom; sage; wise; as, a sagacious remark.

In Homer . . . we find not a few of these sagacious, court sentences, into which men unaccustomed with books are fond of compressing their experience of human life. Prof. Blackie.

4. Showing a great amount of intelligence; acting or endowed with almost human intelligence; said of the lower animals.

Sagaciously (sa-gă'shūs-ly), adv. In a sagacious manner. 'Lord Coke sagaciously observes.' Burke.

Sagaciousness (sa-gă'shūs-nes), n. The quality of being sagacious; sagacity.

Sagacity (sa-gă'si-ti), n. [Fr. sagacité; L. sagacitas, from sagax, sagacis. See SAGACIOUS.] The quality of being sagacious; sagaciousness; as, (a) quickness or acuteness of discernment or penetration; readiness of apprehension with soundness of judgment; clear-headedness; shrewdness and common sense.

Sagacity finds out the intermediate ideas, to discover what connection there is in each link of the chain. Locke.

(b) Intelligence resembling that of mankind; as, the sagacity of a dog or an elephant.

Sagamore (să'ga-mōr), n. 1. Among some tribes of American Indians, a king or chief. Some writers regard sagamore as synonymous with sachem, but others distinguish between them, regarding sachem as a chief of the first rank, and sagamore as one of the second. 'Sagamore, sachem, or powwow.' Longfellow.—2. A juice sometimes used medicinally. Johnson.

Sagapen (să'ga-pen), n. See SAGAPENUM.

Sagapenum (să'ga-pe'nūm), n. [Gr. sagapēnon, the Ferula persica and its gum.] A fetid gum-resin brought from Persia and Alexandria, generally believed to be furnished by some species of the genus Ferula. It occurs either in tears or irregular masses of a dirty brownish colour, containing in the interior white or yellowish grains. It has an odour of garlic, and a hot, acrid, bitterish taste. It is occasionally used in medicine as a nervine and stimulating expectorant.

Sagathy (să'ga-thi), n. [Fr. sagatis; Sp. sagati, sagathy, from L. sagum, a blanket or mantle.] A mixed woven fabric of silk and cotton; sayette. 'A panegyric on pieces of sagathy.' Tatler.

Sagbut (sag'but), n. Same as Sackbut. Burton.

Sage (sāj), n. [Fr. sauge, from L. salvia, sage, from salvus, safe, sound—on account of the reputed virtues of the plant.] The common name of plants of the genus Salvia, a very large genus of monopetalous exogenous plants, nat. order Labiate, containing about 450 species, widely dispersed through the temperate and warmer regions of the globe. They are herbs or shrubs of widely varying habit, usually with entire or cut leaves and various-coloured (rarely yellow) flowers. The best known and most frequently used in this country is the S. officinalis, or garden sage, a native of various parts of the south of Europe. This plant is much used in cookery, and is supposed to assist the stomach in digesting fat and luscious foods. It was formerly in great repute as a sudorific, aromatic, astringent, and antiseptic. It possesses stimulant properties in a high degree, and sage tea is commended as a stomachic and slight stimulant. Two species, S. pratensis (meadow-sage) and S. verbenaca (wild sage or vervain clary), are natives of Great Britain.—Sage apple, an excrecence upon a species of sage (Salvia piceifera) caused by the puncture of an insect.—Sage brush, a low irregular shrub (Artemisia ludoviciana) of the order Composite, growing in dry alkaline soils of the American plains. The name is also given to other American species of Artemisia.—Sage cheese, a kind of cheese, flavoured, and coloured green with the juice of sage. The juice of spinach is also usually added to heighten its colour.—Sage cock, a bird belonging to the Tetraonidæ (Centrocercus urophasianus), resembling the prairie-fowl, but much larger. It is found in the Rocky Mountain region, and feeds on the leaves of the sage brush.

Sage (sāj), a. [Fr. sage, from L. sapius (extant only in ne-sapius, imprudent), later form sabius, wise, from root of sapio, to taste (whence sapient).] 1. Wise; having nice discernment and powers of judging; prudent; sagacious; as, a sage counsellor. 'Sage, grave men.' Shak.

Most men (till by losing render'd sager)
Will back their own opinions with a wager. Byron.

2. Proceeding from wisdom; well-judged; well adapted to the purpose; as, sage counsels. 'Under show of sage advice.' Milton. 3. Grave; solemn; serious. 'Sage and solemn times.' Milton.—SYN. Wise, sagacious, sapient, grave, prudent, judicious.

Sage (sāj), n. A wise man; a man of gravity and wisdom; particularly, a man venerable for years, and known as a man of sound judgment and prudence; a grave philosopher. 'Groves where immortal sages taught.' Pope.

A star,
Unseen before in heaven, proclaims him come,
And guides the eastern sages. Milton.
He thought as a sage but he felt as a man. Beattie.

Sagely (sāj'li), adv. In a sage manner; wisely; with just discernment and prudence. 'Our Saviour sagely thus replied.' Milton.

Sagene (sa-jen'), n. See SAJENE.

Sageness (sāj'nes), n. The quality of being sage; wisdom; sagacity; prudence; gravity.

Sagenite (sāj'en-ī), n. [Fr. sagenite, from L. sagena, Gr. sagenē, a large net.] Acicular rutile, or red oxide of titanium. The acicular crystals cross each other, giving a reticulated appearance; hence the name.

Sagenitic (sāj'en-ī'tik), a. [See above.] Applied to quartz when containing acicular crystals of other materials, most commonly rutile, also tourmaline, actinolite, and the like.

Sage (sag), v.i. Same as Sag.

Sagger (sag'ēr), n. [See SEGGAR.] 1. A segar or clay pot used in making pottery-ware. See SEGGAR.—2. A clay used in making these pots.

Sagina (sa-jī'na), n. Pearl-wort, a genus of plants. See PEARL-WORT.

Saginate (sāj'i-nāt), v.t. [L. sagino, saginatium, to fatten, to feed.] To pamper; to glut; to fatten.

Sagitta (sāj'i-ta), n. [L., an arrow.] 1. The Arrow, one of the old constellations of the northern hemisphere. It contains no stars higher than the fourth magnitude.—2. In zool. a genus of annelids, forming Huxley's order Chaetognatha. This animal is a transparent marine form, attaining the length of about an inch. The head carries a series of setae or bristles surrounding the mouth, and the hinder margin of the body is fringed. A single nerve-mass lies in the abdomen. The species are found living in the open sea, in the Mediterranean, and in the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. The affinities of this animal are with the worms, but it is anomalous in respect of its variations from the worm type.—3. The keystone of an arch. [Rare].—4. In geom. (a) the versed sine of an arc. (b) The abscissa of a curve. [Rare.]

Sagittal (sāj'i-tal), a. [L. sagittalis, from sagitta, an arrow.] Pertaining to an arrow; resembling an arrow. In anat. applied to the suture which unites the parietal bones of the skull.

His wound was between the sagittal and coronal sutures to the bone. Wiseman.

Sagittaria (saj-i-tā'ri-a), n. [From L. sagitta, an arrow—the leaves resembling an arrow-head.] A genus of plants, nat. order Alismaceae. The species are water-plants, and are found in the hotter and temperate parts of the globe, and are frequently remarkable for the beauty of their white three-petalled flowers. S. sagittifolia, or common arrow-head, is indigenous in this country. The rhizomes of many of the species contain amylaceous matter, and form a nutritious food.

Sagittarius (saj-i-tā'ri-us), n. [L., an archer.] One of the zodiacal constellations which the sun enters Nov. 22. It is represented on celestial globes and charts by the figure of a centaur in the act of shooting an arrow from his bow.

Sagittary (sāj'i-ta-ri), n. [See above.] 1. An old name for a centaur.—2. The arsenal at Venice, or the residence there of the commanders of the army and navy: so called from the figure of an archer over the gate. Shak.

Sagittary (saj-i-ta-ri), a. Pertaining to an arrow. Sir T. Browne.

Sagittate (sāj'i-tāt), a. [L. sagitta, an arrow.] Shaped like the head of an arrow; triangular, hollowed at the base, with angles at the hinder part; sagittal: used especially in bot.

Sago (sāj'ō), n. [Malay and Javanese sagu, sago, from Papuan sagu, bread.] A kind of starch, produced from the stem or cellular substance of several palms and palm-like vegetables, the chief of which are the Sagus laevis, S. Rumphii, the Phoenix farinifera, Corypha Gebanga, Caryota urens, Saguerius saccharifer, and some cycads, but these last yield a very inferior sort. Sagus laevis, from which the finest sago is prepared, forms immense forests on nearly all the Moluccas, each tree yielding from 100 to 800 lbs. of sago. The tree when at maturity is about 80 feet high, and from 18 to 22 inches in diameter. The sago or medullary matter, which is prepared by the plant for the use of the flowers and ing, and the meal laid to dry. For exportation, the finest sago meal is mixed with water, and then rubbed into small grains of the size and form of coriander seeds. This is the kind principally brought to England. The Malays have a process for refining sago, and giving it a fine pearly lustre, the method of which is not known to Europeans; but there are strong reasons to believe that heat is employed, because the starch is partially transformed into gum. The sago so cured is in the highest estimation in all the European markets. Sago forms a light, wholesome, nutritious food, and may be used as a pudding, or prepared in other ways as an article of diet for children and invalids when a farinaceous diet is required.—Portland sago. See under ARUM.

Sagoin, Sagouin (sa-goin', sag'ō-in), n. [The native South American name.] A genus (Callithrix) of Brazilian platyrrhine monkeys of small size, and remarkably light, active, and graceful in their movements. Both the body and tail are covered with beautiful fur, and the latter they use as a protection against cold. When tame they are very gentle and much attached to their masters. Their tail is non-prehensile. Called also Squirrel Monkey and Saimaris.

Saguerus (sā-gū-ŕus), n. A genus of plants, nat. order Palmaceae or palms, inhabiting the Indian Archipelago and some parts of the Asiatic continent. S. saccharifer (the arenga or gomuti-palm) is of great value to the natives of the Indian islands, yielding a valuable fibre, palm-wine, and sugar, and considerable quantities of sago, of a rather inferior quality. See GOMUTI.

Sagum (sāj'gum), n. [L.] The military cloak worn by the Roman soldiers and inferior officers, in contradistinction to the paludamentum of the superior officers. It was the garb of war, as the toga was the garb of peace.

Sagus (sāj'gus), n. A genus of palms from which sago is obtained. See SAGO.

Sagy (sāj'ji), a. Full of sage; seasoned with sage.

Sahib (sāj'ib), n. [Hind., from Ar. sahib, lord, master.] A term used by the natives of India or Persia in addressing or speaking of Europeans; as, the sahib did so and so; Colonel sahib. Sahibah is the corresponding feminine form.

Sahlite (sah'lit), n. Same as Malacolite.

Sai (sāj'), n. A species of sapajou or South American platyrrhine monkey, the Cebus capucinus, found in Brazil. Called also the Weeper Monkey. See SAPAJOU.

Saic (sāj'ik), n. [Fr. saïque, from Turk. shaika, a saic.] A Turkish or Grecian vessel, very common in the Levant, a kind of ketch which has no top-gallant-sail nor mizzen-top-sail.

Said (sed), pret. & pp. of say: so written for sayed. 1. Declared; uttered; reported.—2. Aforesaid; before mentioned: used chiefly in legal style. 'King John succeeded his said brother.' Sir M. Hale.

Saiga (sāj'a), n. A species of antelope (Colus or Antelope Saiga) found on the steppes of Russia and on the Russian borders of Asia. It forms one of the two European species of antelopes; the other being the chamois. The nose is of peculiar structure, the openings being very large and covered by a soft cartilaginous arch. The saiga of Tartary (S. Tartarica) is presumably a distinct species from the above.

Sail (sāl), n. [A. Sax. segel, segl, a sail; cog. Icel. segl, G. and Sw. segel, Dan. sejl, D. zeil; the term, no doubt denotes an agent, and the word is probably from an Indo-European root (sagh) meaning to check, to resist.] 1. A piece of cloth or a texture or tissue of some kind spread to the wind to cause, or assist in causing, a vessel to move through the water. The sails of European vessels are usually made of several breadths of canvas, sewed together with a double seam at the borders, and edged all round with a cord or cords called the bolt-rope or bolt-ropes. A sail extended by a yard hung (slung) by the middle and balanced is called a square sail; a sail set upon a gaff, boom, or stay is called a fore-and-aft sail. The upper part of every sail is the head, the lower part the foot, the sides in general are called leeches; but the weather side or edge (that is, the side next the mast or stay to which it is attached) of any but a square sail is called the luff, and the other edge the after leech. The lower two corners of a square sail are in general clues; the weather clue of a fore-and-Sagittate Leaf.

Sago Palm (Sagrus laevis).

fruit, is most abundant just before the evolution or appearance of the spadix or flower-bud. At this period the tree is cut down and the medullary part extracted from the trunk, and reduced to powder like sawdust. The filaments are next separated by wash-aft sail, or of a course while set, is the tack. Sails generally take their names, partly at least, from the mast, yard, or stay upon which they are stretched; thus, the main-course, main-top sail, main-topgallant sail are respectively the sails on the mainmast, main-topmast, and main-topgallant mast. The principal sails in a full-rigged vessel are the courses or lower sails, the topsails and topgallant sails. The cut shows the sails of a ship, which are not greatly different from those of a barque. The vessel represented might, however, carry additional sails to those shown; thus she might have staysails on the stays of the main and mizzen masts, and fore-and-aft sails (called spencers) on the main and fore masts.—2. A funnel-shaped bag, open at both ends, on the deck of a ship to intercept or gather air and lead it below deck for the purpose of ventilation.—3. That portion of the arm of a windmill which catches the wind. 'And the whirling sail goes round.' Tennyson.—4. A wing. [Poetical.]

Salam (sa-lám'), n. Same as Salaam.

Salamander (sal-a-man'dér), n. [Fr. salamandre, L. and Gr. salamandra, Skr. salamandala, salamander.] The popular name of a genus (Salamandra) of amphibian reptiles, order Urodela, very closely allied to the newts, differing from them chiefly in having a cylindrical instead of a compressed tail, and by bringing forth their young alive. The salamanders have an elongated lizard-like form (but differ from lizards in having gills in their early stages), four feet, and a long tail. The head is thick, the tongue broad, and the palatal teeth in two long series. The skin is warty, with many glands secreting a watery fluid, which the animal exudes when alarmed. As this fluid is injurious to small animals the salamanders have the reputation of extreme venomousness, though they are in reality entirely harmless. The best known species is the S. vulgaris, the common salamander of the south of Europe.

Common Salamander (Salamandra vulgaris).

It is about 6 to 8 inches long, is found in moist places under stones or the roots of trees, near the borders of springs, in deep woods, &c., and passes its life in concealment except at night or during rain. It is sometimes called the Spotted Salamander (S. maculosa), from the bright yellow stripes on its sides. There are various other species in Europe, Asia, and America. In America the name is often given to the menopome (Menopoma alleganiense). Salamanders feed on worms, slugs, snails, and insects. According to a superstition once very prevalent, salamanders sought the hottest fire to breed in, quenching it with the extreme frigidity of their body. Pliny tells us he tried the experiment, and the creature was burned to powder. It is probable that the absurd belief is due to the moisture above referred to as exuding from the skin. The salamander of the middle ages was a being in human shape which lived always in fire; a kind of fire-spirit. By some the newts are regarded as salamanders, under the name of Water or Aquatic Salamanders.—2. A pouched rat (Geomys pinetis) found in Georgia and Florida.—3. A large iron poker; also, an iron plate used for cooking purposes. [Provincial].—4. A piece of metal fixed in a suitable handle, and heated, formerly used on board ships for the purpose of firing guns.—Salamander's wool or salamander's hair, a name sometimes given to fibrous asbestos from its incombustibility.

Salamba (sa-lám'ba), n. A kind of fishing net, two corners of which are attached to the upper extremities of two long bamboos tied crosswise, their lower extremities being fastened to a bar on the raft, which acts as a hinge; a movable pole, arranged with a counterpoise as a sort of crane, supports the bamboos at the point of junction, and thus enables the fishermen to raise or depress the net at pleasure. The lower extremities of the net are guided by a cord, which, being drawn towards the raft at the same time that the long bamboos are elevated by the crane and counterpoise, only a small portion of the net remains in the water, and is easily cleared of its contents by means of a landing-net.

Salamstone (sa-lám'stón), n. A variety of sapphire, which consists of small transparent crystals, generally six-sided prisms of pale-reddish and bluish colours. It is brought from Ceylon.

Salary (sál'a-ri), n. [L. salarium, from sal, salt, originally salt-money, money given to buy salt, as part of the pay of Roman soldiers; hence, stipend, pay.] The recompense or consideration stipulated to be paid to a person periodically for services, usually a fixed sum to be paid by the year, half-year, or quarter. When paid at shorter periods the recompense is usually called pay or wages; thus, a judge, governor, or teacher receives a salary; a labourer receives wages.

O, this is hire and salary, not revenge. Shak.

Salary (sál'a-ri), v.t. pret. & pp. salaried; ppr. salarying. To pay a salary or stipend to; to attach a salary to; as, a salaried post.

As long as public teachers are salaried and removable by the people there is very little danger of their becoming tyrants by force. Barlow.

Salary (sál'a-ri), a. Saline. Sir T. Browne. Sale (sál), n. [Ice. sal, sala, sale, bargain; this word stands in some relation to sal as tale to tell.] 1. The act of selling; the exchange of a commodity for an agreed-on price in money paid or to be paid; a transfer of the absolute or general property in a thing for a price in money.—2. Opportunity of selling; demand; market; as, there is no sale for these goods at present.

The countrymen will be more industrious in killing, and rearing of all husbandry commodities, tillage, that they shall have a ready sale for them at those towns. Spenser.

3. Public sale to the highest bidder, or exposure of goods in a market or shop; auction.

Those that won the plate, and those thus sold ought to be marked, so that they may never return to the race or to the sale. Sir W. Temple.

—Sale by inch of candle, a sale or auction where persons are allowed to bid during the time that a small piece of candle takes in burning.—On sale, for sale, to be bought or sold; offered to purchasers.

Salet (sál), n. [A Sax. seath, seal, a sallow or willow.] A wicker basket; also, a basket-like net. Spenser.

Saleable (sál'a-bl), a. Capable of being sold; finding a ready market; in demand. 'Any saleable commodity' removed out of the course of trade. Locke.

Saleableness (sál'a-bl-nes), n. The state of being saleable.

The relative agreeableness, and therefore saleableness, of 'a pot of the smallest ale,' and of 'Adonis painted by a running brook,' depends virtually on the opinion of Demos, in the shape of Christopher Sly.

Ruskin.

Saleably (sál'a-bl), adv. In a saleable manner.

Salebroosity (sál-'bros-i-ti), n. [See SALEBROUS.] The state or quality of being salebrous; rough or rugged.

There is a blaze of honour gilding the briars, and inciting the mind; yet is not this without its thorns and salebroosity. Fellham.

Salebrous (sál-'b-rus), a. [L. salebrosus, from salebra, a rough place; probably allied to salio, to shoot out.] Rough; rugged; uneven. 'A vale that's salebrous indeed.' Cotton. [Rare.]

Salep, Salop (sál'ep, sál'op), n. [Ar. sahleb, salep.] The dried tuberous roots of different species of orchis, especially O. mascula, im-apparatus used on the banks near Manila, fitted upon a raft composed of several tiers of bamboos. It consists of a rectangular ported from Persia and Asia Minor. Salep occurs in commerce in small oval balls of a whitish-yellow colour, at times semi-transparent, of a horny aspect, very hard, with a faint peculiar smell, and a taste like that of gum-tragacanth, but slightly saline. It is much valued in the East for its supposed general stimulant properties, and is also esteemed as a nutritious food well suited to children and convalescents. For use it is ground into a fine powder, and mixed with boiling water, sugar and milk being added according to taste. As a diet drink it used to be considered very nutritious and wholesome in this country, and was sold in London at stalls ready prepared, as coffee, its substitute, now is.

Salamba of Manila.

Saleratus (sal-e-rä'tus), n. [For sal aeratus, lit. aerated salt.] The prepared carbonate of soda and salt used for mixing with the flour in baking, to evolve the carbonic acid gas on the addition of water, and so make the bread-light. Bret Harte. [United States.]

Sale-room (säl'röm), n. A room in which goods are sold; specifically, an auction-room.

Salesman (säl'män), n. One whose occupation is to sell goods or merchandise; specifically, a wholesale dealer, of whom there are various kinds in important commercial centres; as, a cattle, meat, butter, hide, hay, fish, or other salesman. Simmonds.—Dead salesman, a wholesale dealer in butcher-meat; one who disposes of consignments of dead meat by auction or other modes of sale.

Saléut, † Saluë, † v. t. [Fr. saluer.] To salute. Chaucer.

Salework (säl'wërk), n. Work or things made for sale; hence, work carelessly done. 1. See no more in you than in the ordinary of Nature's salework. Shak.

Salian (säl'i-an), a. Of or pertaining to a tribe of Franks who were settled on the Sala from the third to the middle of the fourth century.

Salian (säl'i-an), n. A member of a tribe of Franks. See the adjective.

Salian (säl'i-an), a. Of or pertaining to the Salii or priests of Mars in ancient Rome.—Salian hymns, songs sung at an annual festival by the priests of Mars, in praise of that deity, other gods, and of distinguished men. The songs were accompanied by warlike dances, the clashing of ancilia (shields of a peculiar form), &c.

Saliant (säl'i-ant), a. In her. see SALIENT.

Saliaunce, † Saliance, † n. Assault or sally. Spenser.

Salic (säl'ik), a. [Fr. salique.] A term applied to a law or code of laws belonging to the Salian Franks. One of the laws in this code excluded women from inheriting certain lands, probably because certain military duties were connected with the holding of those lands. In the fourteenth century females were excluded from the throne of France by the application of this law to the succession to the crown, and it is in this sense that the term salic law is commonly used.

Salicaceæ (sal-i-kä'së-ë), n. pl. [L. salix, salix, a willow.] A nat. order of apetalous exogens, distinguished by a two-valved capsule, and numerous seeds tufted with long hairs. The species are trees or shrubs, inhabiting woods in the northern districts of Europe, Asia, and America. Only two genera are included in the order, Salix or willow, and Populus or poplar.

Salicaceous (sal-i-kä'shus), a. Of or relating to the willow, or the order Salicaceæ.

Salicetum (sal-i-së'tum), n. [L. from salix, a willow.] A willow plantation.

Salicin, Salicine (säl'i-sin), n. [L. salix, a willow.] ($C_{12}H_{18}O_6$.) A bitter crystallizable substance extracted from willow barks and from that of the poplar. It possesses tonic properties analogous to those of quinine, and is a valuable stomachic bitter.

Salicornia (sal-i-kör'n-i-a), n. [From L. sal, salis, salt, and cornu, a horn.] A genus of plants, nat. order Chenopodiaceæ, the species of which are known by the common name of glasswort or saltwort, and well distinguished by their jointed stems. They are mostly weeds inhabiting moist salt districts on the coasts of the north of Europe, Africa, and America. S. herbacea and S. radicans are natives of Great Britain. S. herbacea, and many other species, yield a great quantity of soda.

Salicylic (säl-i-sil'ik), a. [L. salix, a willow, and Gr. hyle, matter.] The name given to an acid ($C_7H_5O_3$) obtained from oil of wintergreen and from other sources, as salicin. It crystallizes in tufts of slender prisms. It has come into very general use as an antiseptic substance; and being devoid of poisonous properties it may be employed for preserving foods, &c., from decay.

Salience (säl'i-ens), n. The quality or condition of being salient; the quality or state of projecting or being projected; projection; protrusion.

The thickness and salience of the external frontal table remains apparent. Sir W. Hamilton.

Salient (säl'i-ent), a. [L. saliens, ppr. of salio, to leap.] 1. Moving by leaps; leaping; bounding; jumping. 'Frogs and salient animals.' Sir T. Browne.—2. Shooting up or out; springing; beating; throbbing. 'The salient spout.' Pope. 'A salient living spring of generous and manly action.' Burke.

Do beating hearts of salient springs Keep measure with thine own? Tennyson.

3. Having the apex turned towards the outside; projecting outwardly; as, a salient angle.—4. Forcing itself on the notice or attention; conspicuous; prominent.

He (Grenville) had neither salient traits nor comprehensiveness of mind. Bancroft.

5. In her. a term applied to a lion or other beast represented in a leaping posture, with his right fore-foot in the dexter point, and his left hinder foot in the sinister base of the escutcheon. Written also Saliant.

Salient (säl'i-ent), n. A salient angle or part; a projection.

Saliently (säl'i-ent-li), adv. In a salient manner.

Saliferous (sa-lif'er-us), a. [L. sal, salt, and fero, to produce.] Producing or bearing salt; as, saliferous rock.—Saliferous system, an old geological term for the new red sandstone system, so named from salt being a characteristic of this system.

Salifiable (sal'i-fi-a-bl), a. Capable of being salified or of combining with an acid to form a salt.

Salification (sal'i-fi-kä'shon), n. The act of salifying.

Salify (sal'i-fi), v. t. pret. & pp. salified; ppr. salifying. [L. sal, salt, and facio, to make.] To form into a salt by combining an acid with a base.

Saligot (sal'i-got), n. [Fr.] A plant, Trapa natans.

Salimeter (sa-lim'et-ër), n. [L. sal, salis, salt, and Gr. metron, a measure.] An instrument for measuring the amount of salt present in any given solution.

Salina (sa-l'i-na), n. [Sp., from L. sal, salt.] 1. A salt marsh or salt pond inclosed from the sea.—2. A place where salt is made from salt water; salt-works.

Salination (sal-i-nä'shon), n. [See below.] The act of washing with or soaking in salt liquor.

The Egyptians might have been accustomed to wash the body with the same pickle they used in salination. Greenhill.

Saline (sa-lin'), a. [Fr. salin, from L. sal, salt.] 1. Consisting of salt or constituting salt; as, saline particles; saline substances. 2. Partaking of the qualities of salt; as, a saline taste.

Saline (sa-lin'), n. [Fr. saline. See adjective.] A salt spring, or a place where salt water is collected in the earth.

Salineness (sa-lin'nes), n. State of being saline.

Saliniferous (sal-i-nif'er-us), a. Producing salt.

Saliniform (sa-lin'i-form), a. Having the form of salt.

Salinity (sa-lin'i-ti), n. The state or quality of being saline or salt; salineness.

The salinity of the deep water of the Atlantic differs very little from that of its surface-water, being sometimes a little greater and sometimes a little less. Dr. Carpenter.

Salinometer (sal-i-nom'et-ër), n. [Saline, and Gr. metron, measure.] An apparatus for indicating the density of brine in the boilers of marine steam-engines, and thus showing when they should be cleaned by blowing off the deposit left by the salt water, which tends to injure the boilers as well as to diminish their evaporating power.

Salino-terrene (sa-lin'ö-ter-rën'), a. [L. sal, salt, and terrenus, from terra, earth.] Pertaining to or composed of salt and earth.

Salinous (sa-lin'us), a. Same as Saline. Sir T. Browne.

Salique (säl'ik or sa-lëk'), a. Salic. 'Ful-mined out her scorn of laws salique.' Tennyson. See SALIC.

Salisburia (sal-is-bü'ri-a), n. [In honour of Richard Anthony Salisbury, a distinguished English botanist.] A genus of plants, nat. order Taxaceæ, the yew tribe. S. adiantifolia, a Japanese species (called ginkgo or ginkgo in Japan), is commonly cultivated, and is remarkable on account of its peculiar leaves resembling those of the fern called maiden-hair. The fruit is as large as a damson, and is resinous and astringent. The kernels are used in Japan to promote digestion.

Salite (säl'it), v. t. pret. & pp. salited; ppr. saliting. [L. salio, from sal, salt.] To salt; to impregnate or season with salt.

Saliva (sa-l'iv-a), n. [L. akin to Gr. sialon, saliva. Comp. Gael. and Ir. seile, saliva, slim, to drop, to distil, to spit.] The fluid which is secreted by the salivary glands, and which serves to moisten the mouth and tongue. The principal use of saliva is that of converting the starchy elements of the food into grape-sugar and dextrine. When discharged from the mouth it is called spittle. Saliva contains about 5 or 6 parts of solid matter to 995 or 994 of water, the chief ingredients being an organic matter named ptyalin and sulphocyanide of potassium. In its normal state its reaction is alkaline, but the degree of alkalinity varies, being greatest after meals. The parotid saliva is limpid, and serves to moisten the food in the process of mastication; the sub-maxillary and sub-lingual saliva is viscid, and is essential to deglutition and gustation.

Salival (sa-l'iv-al), a. Same as Salivary.

Salivant (säl'i-vant), a. [L. salivans. See SALIVATE.] Exciting salivation.

Salivant (säl'i-vant), n. That which produces salivation.

Salivary (säl'i-va-ri), a. [L. salivarius.] Pertaining to saliva; secreting or conveying saliva; as, salivary glands; salivary ducts or canals.

Such animals as swallow their aliment without chewing want salivary glands. Arbuthnot.

Salivate (säl'i-vät), v. t. pret. & pp. salivated; ppr. salivating. [L. salivo, salivare, to spit forth, to salivate. See SALIVA.] To purge by the salivary glands; to produce an unusual secretion and discharge of saliva in, usually by mercury; to produce ptyalism in.

Salivation (sal-i-vä'shon), n. An abnormally abundant flow of saliva; the act or process of producing an excessive secretion of saliva, generally by means of mercury; ptyalism.

Salivous (sa-l'iv-us), a. [L. salivosus.] Pertaining to saliva; partaking of the nature of saliva. 'Salivous humour.' Wiseman.

Salix (säl'iks), n. [L., a willow.] A genus of plants of the nat. order Salicaceæ. It consists of numerous species, all either trees or shrubs, occurring abundantly in all the cooler parts of the northern hemisphere. It comprehends the plants called osiers, willows, and poplars, and is of great economical value, not only for the purposes of the basketmaker, but because several species have a bark which contains a great quantity of tannin. British botanists are not agreed as to the number of species into which the native willows should be distributed, for while Bentham reckons only fifteen, Babington extends the list to fifty-eight. See WILLOW.

Salée-man (sa-lë'män), n. A coelenterate animal of the genus Velella (which see).

Sallenders (säl'en-dër-z), n. See SELLANDERS.

Sallet, Salade (säl'let, säl'ad), n. [Fr. sa-

Sallets.

a, German Sallet, with fixed vizor (fifteenth cent.)
b, English Sallet, with movable vizor (reign of Henry VI.)
c, d, Sallet of the archers of sixteenth century; profile and front views.

lade, It. celata, from L. celata (cassis, helmet understood), engraved, chiselled, from cælo, to engrave—so called from the figures cut on it.] A kind of light helmet, first used in the fifteenth century. Its characteristic mark is the projection behind. Sallets were made of various forms, and with and without the vizor. See a punning use of this term in extract under next word.

Sallet, Salleting† (sa'let, sa'let-ing), n. A salad. In the following extract there is a play upon this word and sallet in sense of a helmet.

Wherefore have I climbed into this garden . . . to see if I can eat a grass or pick a sallet . . . which is not amiss to cool a man's stomach this hot weather. And, I think, this word sallet was born to do me good: for many a time, but for a sallet, my brain-pan had been cleft with a brown-bill; and, many a time, when I have been dry, and bravely marching, it hath served me in stead of a quart-pot to drink in; and now the word sallet must serve me to feed on. Shak.

Salliance† (sa'li-ans), n. Same as Salience. Sallow (sa'lō), n. [O.E. salewe, salwe, salwe, A. Sax. sealh, salig, Sc. saugh, Icel. selja, Dan. selje, O.H.G. salaha, Mod. G. salh; the word is widely spread; comp. L. salix, Gael. seilach, Ir. sail—sallow, willow; also Basque saliga, Finnish salavoa, with same sense.] The common name of various species of the genus Salix or willow kind. The great or goat willow (Salix caprea) puts forth its handsome yellow blossoms very early in the spring. Its bark is much used for tanning, and its wood for making implements of husbandry. It is also grown for hoop-making.

Sallow (sa'lō), a. [A. Sax. salu, salowig, sealuwe, sallow, dark; Icel. sólr, D. saluue, O.H.G. salto, pale.] Having a yellowish colour; of a pale, sickly colour, tinged with a dark yellow: said of the skin or complexion; as, a sallow skin.

What a deal of brine Hath washed thy sallow cheeks for Rosaline! Shak. Sallow (sa'lō), v.t. To tinge with a sallow or yellow colour.

July breathes hot, sallows the crispy fields. F. R. Lowell.

Sallowish (sa'lō-ish), a. Somewhat sallow or yellow in colour. 'A youngish, sallowish gentleman in spectacles.' Dickens.

Sallowness (sa'lō-ness), n. The quality of being sallow; paleness, tinged with a dark yellow; as, sallowness of complexion.

Sallow-thorn (sa'lō-thorn). See HIPPORHAE.

Sally (sal'lī), n. [Fr. sallie, from sailir, to leap, from L. salio, salire, to leap, to spring (whence salient).] 1. A leaping forth; a darting or shooting.

I come from haunts of coot and hern,
I make a sudden sally,
And sparkle out among the fern. Tennyson.

2. A rushing or bursting forth; a quick issue; a sudden eruption; specifically, an issuing or rushing of troops from a besieged place to attack the besiegers; as, the garrison made a sally.—3. A spring or darting of intellect, fancy, or imagination; flight; sprightly exertion.

These passages were intended for sallies of wit. Stillingfleet.

4. An excursion; a trip; a run.

Every one shall know a country better that makes often sallies into it, and traverses it up and down, than he that like a mill-horse goes still round in the same track. Locke.

5. Act of levity or extravagance; wild gaiety; frolic; a going beyond ordinary rules. 'A sally of youth.' Sir J. Denham.

Some sallies of levity ought to be imputed to youth. Swift.

6. In arch. a projection; the end of a piece of timber cut with an interior angle formed by two planes across the fibres, as the feet of common rafters.

Sally (sal'lī), v.i. pret. & pp. sallied; ppr. sallying. [From the noun.] To leap or rush out; to dart or burst forth; specifically, to issue suddenly, as a body of troops from a fortified place, to attack besiegers.

They break the truce, and sally out by night. Dryden.

Sally-lun, Sally-lunn (sa'lī-lun), n. [From Sally Lunn, a young woman who sold this species of bun through the streets of Bath about the end of the eighteenth century.] A kind of sweet bun or tea-cake, larger than a muffin. It is toasted and eaten hot with butter.

It is a sort of night that's meant for muffins; like-wise crumpets; also sally-luns. Dickens.

Sally-port (sa'lī-pōrt), n. 1. In fort. a postern gate, or a passage under ground from the inner to the outer works, to afford free egress to troops in making a sally, closed by massive gates when not in use.—2. A large port on each quarter of a fireship, for the escape of the men into boats when the train is fired.

Salmagundi, Salmagundy (sal-ma-gun'dī), n. [Fr. salmigondis.] 1. A mixture of chopped meat, eggs, anchovies, red pickled cabbage, &c., served at table as a corner dish. Hence—2. A mixture of various ingredients; an olio or medley; a miscellany. W. Irving.

Salmi, Salmis (sāl'mē), n. [Fr.] A ragout of roasted woodcocks, larks, thrushes, and other species of game, minced and stewed with wine, little pieces of bread, and other ingredients calculated to provoke the appetite.

Salmiac (sa'lmi-ak), n. A contraction of Sal Ammoniac.

Salmo (sa'l'mō), n. [L., a salmon.] A genus of teleostean malacopterygious fishes, containing many species, of which the most important British member is S. salar, the salmon of our rivers. (See SALMON.) The salmon-trout is S. trutta, and the gray or bull trout S. eriox. In the North American rivers there are several species distinct from ours.

Salmon (sam'un), n. [L. salmo, Fr. saumon.] A fish of the genus Salmo (the S. salar), found in all the northern portions of Europe, America, and Asia. The salmon is both a marine and a fresh-water fish. Its normal locality may be said to be the mouth or estuary of the larger rivers, whence, in the season of sexual excitement, it ascends to the spawning beds, which are frequently far inland, near the head-waters of the rivers. On reaching the spawning station the female by means of her tail makes a furrow in the gravelly bed of the river, in which she deposits her spawn or eggs, numbering many thousands, which, when impregnated by the male accompanying her, she carefully covers up by rapid sweeps of her tail. At this season the snout of the male undergoes a strange transformation, the under jaw becoming hooked upward with a cartilaginous excrescence, which is used as a weapon in the combats frequent when two or more males attach themselves to one female. In this condition he is known as a kipper. The time occupied in spawning is from three to twelve days, and the season extends from the end of autumn till spring. After spawning, the salmon, both male and female, proceed to the sea under the name of spent fish, foul fish, or *kelt*s, the females being further distinguished as shedders or baggrits. In from 80 to 140 days the young fish emerges from the egg. At its emergence it is about $\frac{1}{8}$ inch long, and not unlike a tadpole.

In this embryonic state it is nourished from a vitelline, or umbilical vesicle, suspended under the belly, containing the red yolk of the egg and oil-globules, which constitute its food. When about fifty days old it assumes the appearance of a fish, is about 1 inch in length, and receives the name of salmlet or parr. It continues in the shallows of its native stream till the following spring, when it is from 3 to 4 inches long, and is known as the May parr. It now descends into deeper parts of the river, where the weaker fish remain till the end of the second spring, the stronger ones remaining till the end of the first spring only. When the season of its migration arrives, generally the month of May or June, the fins have become darker and the fish has assumed a silvery hue. It is now known as a smolt or salmon-fry. The smolts now congregate into shoals and proceed leisurely seaward. On reaching the estuary they remain in its brackish water for a short time, and then proceed to the open sea. Of their life there nothing is known, except that they grow with such rapidity that a fish which reaches the estuary weighing, it may be, not more than 2 ozs., may return to it from the sea, after a few months, as a grilse, weighing 8 or 10 lbs. A grilse under 2 lbs. is called a salmon parr. At two years and eight months the grilse becomes a salmon. The salmon returns in preference to the river in which it passed its earlier existence. It has been known to grow to the weight of 83 lbs.; more generally it is from 15 to 25 lbs. It furnishes a delicious dish for the table, and is an important article of commerce, the rivers of Scotland in particular supplying immense quantities for the market. Its flesh is of a pinkish orange colour.

Salmon-colour (sam'un-kul-ēr), n. The colour of the flesh of the salmon.

Salmonet (sam'un-et), n. [Dim. of salmon.] A little salmon; a salmlet.

Salmonidæ (sal-mon'ī-dē), n. pl. The salmon tribe, a family of fishes belonging to the Malacopterygii abdominales, of which the salmon is the type. Numerous species are found in the northern hemisphere, one of the largest of which is the common salmon (S. salar). Osmerus, Mallotus, Thymallus, Coregonus, Argentina, Anastomus, and Gasteroplectes are among the genera.

Salmonoid (sam'un-oid), a. A term applied to fishes belonging to the tribe Salmonidæ, of which the salmon is the type.

Salmon-trout (sam'un-trout), n. The Salmo trutta, a species which in value ranks next to the salmon itself. It resembles the salmon in form and colour, and is, like it, migratory, ascending rivers to deposit its spawn.

Salon (sā-lōn), n. [Fr.] An apartment for the reception of company; a saloon; hence, in the plural, fashionable assemblages; circles of fashionable society.

Saloon (sa-lōn'), n. [Fr. and Sp. salon, It. salone, from Fr. salie, It. and Sp. sal, a hall, from O.H.G. sal, a house, an abode, same word as A. Sax. sæl, a hall, a house.] 1. Any spacious or elegant apartment for the reception of company or for works of art; a hall of reception; a large public room; also, a hall for public entertainments or amusement; an apartment for specific public use; as, the saloon of a steamer; a refreshment saloon, &c. 'The gilded saloons in which the first magnates of the realm . . . gave banquets and balls.' Macaulay.—2. In arch. a lofty, spacious hall, frequently vaulted at the top, and usually comprehending two stories, with two ranges of windows. It is often in the middle of a building, and is sometimes lighted from the top. Gwilt.

Saloop (sa-lōp'). Same as Salop.

Salpa (sa'lpa), n. [L. salpa, a kind of stock-fish.] A genus of tunicate molluscs which float in the sea, protected by a transparent gelatinous coat, perforated for the passage of water at both extremities. These animals are very abundant in the Mediterranean, and the warmer parts of the ocean, and are frequently phosphorescent. They are met with in two conditions known as single and chain salpæ. The latter give origin to the single forms by sexual reproduction, whilst the single forms produce the chain-salpæ by budding.

Salpian (sa'lpi-an), n. A tunicate mollusc of the genus Salpa (which see).

Salpicon† (sa'lpi-kon), n. [Fr. and Sp., from salpicar, to besprinkle; Pg., to corn, to powder, from sal, salt, and picar, to prick.] Stuffing; farce; chopped meat or bread, &c., used to stuff legs of veal. Bacon.

Salpidæ (sa'lpi-dē), n. pl. A family of molluscs, of which Salpa is the typical genus. See SALPA.

Salpingo-pharyngeus (sal-ping'gō-fa-rin-jē-us), n. [Gr. salpingx, a tube or trumpet, and pharynx, the pharynx.] In anat. that part of the palato-pharyngeus muscle which arises from the mouth of the Eustachian tube.

Salpinx (sa'lpingks), n. [L.] In anat. the Eustachian tube. See EUSTACHIAN.

Salsafy (sa'l'sa-fi). See SALSIFY.

Salsamentarius† (sa'l'sa-men-tā'ri-us), a. [L. salsamentarius.] Pertaining to or containing salt; salted. Bailey.

Salse (sāl's), n. [Fr. salse, from L. salsus, salted.] An eruption of hot acidulated mud from a small orifice, generally in volcanic regions, and frequently accompanied by steam and gases at a high temperature, which act powerfully on the surrounding solid matters, disintegrating and decomposing them, and forming new compounds. In some districts the gases are inflammable, and flames issue from the orifices. Page.

Salsify (sa'l'si-fi), n. [Fr. salsifis, goat's-beard.] A plant, Tragopogon porrifolius, called also purple goat's-beard. See GOAT'S-BEARD. Written also Salsafy.

Salsilla (sa'l-sil'la), n. [Sp., from L. salsus, salted, sal, salt.] A name of several amarillaceous plants producing edible tubers, and belonging to the genus Bomarea, or to the closely allied genus Alstrœmeria. One species (B. or A. edulis) is cultivated in the West Indies, its roots being eaten like the potato; it is diaphoretic and diuretic. Other species, such as E. salsilla, are natives of the Peruvian Andes, and are pretty twining plants with showy flowers.

Salso-acid (sa'l'sō-as-id), a. [L. salsus, salt, and acidus, acid.] Having a taste compounded of saltiness and acidness. [Rare.]

Salsola (sal'sô-la), n. [New L., from L. salsus, salt, in allusion to the alkaline salts which the species contain.] A genus of plants, nat. order Chenopodiaceae; saltwort.

The species are found chiefly on the sea-shore in temperate parts of the world, and also in hot parts where the soil is saline, or there is salt water in the vicinity. S. Kali, found on the coasts of Europe and many parts of the world, is one of the species which is burnt for the purpose of yielding kelp and barilla. It is a brittle succulent annual, with angular bristly stems and small pink flowers. It is very much branched, and forms a spreading bush a foot or a foot and a half high. S. Soda, found on the coasts of Spain, is employed for the same purpose. Other species, on the coasts of the Red Sea, yield soda. S. Kali is a British plant.

Salsola Kali (Prickly Saltwort).

Salsolaceae (sal-sô-lă'shus), a. Pertaining to the genus Salsola.

Salsuginous (sal-sû-jin-us), a. [L. salsugo, salsuginis, saltiness, from sal, salt.] Saltish; somewhat salt. Boyle.

Salt (salt), n. [A. Sax. sealt, salt—a word found throughout the Indo-European languages, as Fris. Dan. Sw. Icel. and Goth. salt, D. zout, G. Salz, W. halen, Gael. and Ir. salann, Corn. and Armor. halinn, halen, Rus. soly, L. sal (hence Fr. sel, It. sale, Sp. sal), Gr. hals (= sals), Skr. sara.] 1. (NaCl) Chloride of sodium, formerly termed muriate of soda, a substance which has been known, and in common use, as a seasoner and preserver of food from the earliest ages. It is formed when chlorine and sodium or hydrochloric acid and soda come together. It possesses a crystalline structure, derived from the cube, which is its primitive form. It is found in immense quantity dissolved in sea-water and in the water of salt-springs, and in smaller quantity in all natural waters, by which, indeed, it is carried to the sea, where it accumulates. Salt is also found abundantly, as rock-salt, in various countries, large beds of it (which when worked are termed salt-mines) being situated between the coal formation and the lias. It is obtained from sea-water by simple evaporation, either spontaneous or with the aid of heat; but immense quantities are obtained from the salt-mines in the neighbourhood of Northwich, in Cheshire, and the salt-springs in Cheshire and Worcestershire furnish a large proportion of the salt made use of in Great Britain. One chief use of salt is as an antiseptic in curing meat; it is also largely employed as a condiment to food, or rather as a substance indispensable to digestion. Common salt is the starting-point in the manufacture of soda crystals, in the manufacture of chlorine, &c. It forms a glaze for coarse pottery; it improves the whiteness and clearness of glass; it gives hardness to soap; it is used as a mordant, and for improving certain colours; and enters more or less into many other processes of the arts.—2. In chem. a term the exact meaning of which it is difficult to define. In its widest sense the term salt may be used to include all chemical elements and compounds. It is generally applied, however, to compounds only, and more particularly to such as readily undergo double decomposition. The products of such decompositions are usually also termed salts. The nomenclature of salts has reference to the acids from which they are derived. For example, sulphates, nitrates, carbonates, &c., imply salts of sulphuric, nitric, and carbonic acids. The termination ate implies the maximum of oxygen in the acids, and ite the minimum. If neither the acid nor base of a salt be in excess it is termed a neutral salt; if the acid predominate it is called an acid salt, and if the base prevail it is called a basic salt. Many salts are hydrous, that is, they contain a definite proportion of water of crystallization; others are dry or anhydrous salts. Some salts attract moisture when exposed to air, and are called deliquescent; others suffer their water to escape, and become opaque or pulverulent: these are called efflorescent salts. The combination of salts with each other gives rise to compounds called double salts, as sulphate of calcium and sodium, the borofluoride of potassium, &c. According to the views of modern chemists all true acids are hydrogen compounds, and all their salts compounds of metals with radicals, simple or compound. Hence they define an acid to be a compound containing hydrogen, which can be, in whole or in part, replaced by metal; and a salt, a compound formed by replacing the hydrogen of an acid by a metal.—Decrepitating salts, those which burst when heated, with a crackling noise, into smaller fragments, as the nitrates of baryta and lead.—Essential salts, those which are procured from the juices of plants by crystallization.—Fixed salts, those which are prepared by calcining, then boiling the matter in water, straining off the liquor, and evaporating all the moisture, when the salt remains in the form of a powder.—Fusible salt, the phosphate of ammonia.—Incompatible salt. See INCOMPATIBLE.—Microcosmic salt. See MICROCOSMIC.—Native salts, mineral bodies resembling precious stones or gems in their external character, and so named to distinguish them from artificial salts.—Permanent salts, those which undergo no change on exposure to the air.—Volatile salts, such as are procured principally from animal substances or the fermented parts of plants, as the subcarbonate of ammonia.—Salt of lemons, binxolate of potash: often used to remove stains of iron rust, &c., from linen. The name is also applied to oxalic acid, used for the same purpose.—Salt of Saturn, acetate of lead; sugar of lead: from Saturn, the alchemistic name of lead.—Salt of soda, carbonate of soda.—Salt of sorrel. Same as Salt of Lemons.—Salt of tartar, carbonate of potash, which was first prepared from cream of tartar.—Salt of tin, a term applied by dyers and calico-printers to protochloride of tin, which is extensively used as a mordant, and for the purpose of deoxidizing indigo and the peroxides of iron and manganese.—Salt of vitriol, sulphate of zinc.—Salt of wisdom, a double chloride of mercury and ammonium.—Salt perlate, phosphate of soda.—Spirit of salt, muriatic or hydrochloric acid.—3. Taste; smack; savour; flavour.

Though we are justices, and doctors, and churchmen, Master Page, we have some salt of our youth in us. Shak.
4. Wit; piquancy; pungency; sarcasm; as, Attic salt.—5. That which seasons or gives flavour; that which preserves from corruption. Ye are the salt of the earth. Mat. v. 13.
6. A vessel for holding salt; a salt-cellar. 'A dozen of silver salts.' Pepys.
Another salt was fashioned of silver, in form of a swan in full sail. Sir W. Scott.
7. A marshy place flooded by the tide. [Provincial.]—8. A sailor, especially an old sailor. [Colloq.]—Above or below the salt, phrases having their origin in the subordination formerly maintained among persons at the same table. The family salt-cellar, a utensil of massive silver, was placed near the middle of the table, and persons of distinction were seated above it, while dependants and inferior guests sat below it. Frequent reference to this custom is to be found in the old dramatists and other early writers.
His fashion is not to take knowledge of him that is beneath him in clothes. He never drinks below the salt. B. Jonson.
—To be worth one's salt, to be worthy of one's hire.
He loved to earn his money. He delighted to believe that he was worth his salt. Dickens.

Salt (salt), a. 1. Furnished or impregnated with salt; abounding in, containing, or producing salt; prepared with or tasting of salt; as, salt beef; salt water; a salt spring. 2. Overflowed with or growing in salt water; as, a salt marsh; salt grass or hay.—3. Sharp; bitter; pungent. 'The pride and salt scorn of his eyes.' Shak.—4. Lecherous; salacious. 'His salt and most hidden loose affection.' Shak.—5. Costly; dear; expensive; as, he paid a salt price for it. [Colloq.]

Salt (salt), v.t. 1. To sprinkle, impregnate, or season with salt; as, to salt fish, beef, or pork.—2. To fill with salt between the timbers and planks, as a ship, for the preservation of the timber.—To salt an invoice, account, &c., to put on the extreme value on each article, in some cases in order to be able to make what seems a liberal discount at payment.—To salt a mine, to give it a spurious appearance of richness by introducing high-class ore from somewhere else, in order to deceive: a trick practised in connection with gold-mining.

Salt (salt), v.i. To deposit salt from a saline substance; as, the brine begins to salt. Salt (salt), n. [Fr. sault, L. saltus, a leap.] A leap; the act of jumping. 'Frisking lambs make wanton salts.' B. Jonson. Saltant (salt'ant), a. [L. saltans, saltantis, ppr. of salto, to leap.] 1. Leaping; jumping; dancing.—2. In her. a term applied to the squirrel, weasel, rat, and all vermin, and also to the cat, greyhound, ape, and monkey, when in a position springing forward.

Saltate (sal'tât), v.i. pret. saltated; ppr. saltating. [L. salto, saltatum, a freq. from salio, to leap.] To leap; to jump; to skip. [Rare.]

Saltation (sal-tă'shon), n. [L. saltatio, saltationis, from salto, a freq. of salio, to leap.] 1. A leaping or jumping.

The locusts being ordained for saltation, their hinder legs do far exceed the others. Sir T. Browne.

2. Beating or palpitation; as, the saltation of the great artery. Wiseman.

Saltatores (sal-tă-tô'rez), n. pl. See SALTIGRADES.

Saltatoria (sal-tă-tô-ri-a), n. pl. [L. saltatorius, leaping. See SALTATION.] The name given by Cuvier to his second family of orthopterous insects, which have the four anterior legs simple and short, and the two hind-legs long, and formed for leaping. It includes the crickets, grasshoppers, locusts, &c.

Saltatorious (sal-tă-tô-ri-us), a. Same as Saltatory.

Saltatory (salt'a-to-ri), a. [See above.] Leaping or dancing, or having the power of leaping or dancing; adapted for leaping. The hind-legs of the kangaroo, cricket, &c., are saltatory.

Salt-box (salt'boks), n. A wooden box, rather deep, with a sloped lid, used for holding salt in kitchens, &c.

Salt-butter (salt'but-ér), n. Butter seasoned with salt to make it keep. Shakspeare uses it as an adjective: 'Mechanical salt-butter rogue' (that is, dealing in salt-butter).

Saltcake (salt'kâk), n. The technical name for the sulphate of soda produced in the manufacture of soda-ash. It is used by soap-boilers and crown-glass makers.

Salt-cat (salt'kat), n. A lump of salt, made at a salt-works; also, a mixture of gravel, loam, rubbish of old walls, cummin-seed, salt, and stale urine, for food to pigeons. Mortimer.

Salt-cellar (salt'sel-lér), n. [A tautological term, lit. a salt-salt-dish, cellar here being = Fr. salière, a salt-cellar, from L. sal, salt.] A small vessel used for holding salt on the table.

When any salt is spilt on the table-cloth, shake it out into the salt-cellar. Swift.

Salt-duty (salt'dû-ti), n. A duty on salt; in London, a duty formerly payable to the lord-mayor, &c., for salt brought to the port of London, being the twentieth part.

Salter (salt'ér), n. 1. One who salts; one who gives or applies salt.—2. One that sells salt.—3. A dysalterer. The incorporated salters, or dysalters, of London form one of the city livery companies.

Saltarn (salt'érn), n. A salt-work; a building in which salt is made by boiling or evaporation; more especially, a plot of retentive land, laid out in pools and walks, where the sea-water is admitted to be evaporated by the heat of the sun's rays. E. H. Knight.

Salt-fish (salt'fish), n. 1. Fish in brine, or fish salted and dried.—2. A fish from salt water.

Salt-foot (salt'füt), n. A large salt-cellar formerly placed near the middle of a long table to mark the place of division between the superior and the inferior guests. See under SALT.

Salt-green (sălt'grĕn), a. Green like the sea.

Salt-holder (sălt'hôld-ĕr), n. A salt-cellar. Lord Lytton.

Salticus (sălt'ik-us), n. [L. salticus, dancing, from saltus, saltum, to dance.] A genus of wandering spiders which do not spin webs, and are to be observed on walls, palings, &c., in hot and fine weather. The S. formicarius is a common British species.

Saltier (sălt'ĕr), n. Same as Saltire.

Saltier (sălt'ĕr), n. A blunder for Satyr.

There is three carriers, three shepherds, three neat-herds, three swine-herds, that have made themselves all men of hair, they call themselves saltiers, and they have a dance which the wenches say is a gallimaufry of gambols. Shak.

Saltigrada (sălt'i-gră-da), n. pl. [L. saltus, a leap, and gradior, to walk.] A tribe of spiders which seize their prey by leaping upon it from a distance. Called also Saltatores.

Saltigrade (sălt'i-grăd), a. Leaping; formed for leaping.

Saltigrade (sălt'i-grăd), n. One of the Saltigrada.

Saltinbanco, † Saltimbanco† (sălt-tin-bang'kô, sălt-tim-bang'kô), n. [It. saltimbanco, Fr. saltimbanque, a mountebank; It. saltare in banco, to leap on the bench, to mount on the bench.] A mountebank; a quack.

Saltinbancoes, quacksalvers, and charlatans deceive them. Sir T. Browne.

Salting (sălt'ing), n. A salt-marsh.

Saltire, Saltier (sălt'ĕr), n. [O. Fr. sautoir, Mod. Fr. sautoir, originally a kind of stirrup, from sauter, L. salto, intens. of saltio, to leap.] In her, an ordinary in the form of a St. Andrew's cross, formed by two bands, dexter and sinister, crossing each other. Long-shaped charges (swords, batons, &c.), placed in the direction of the saltire, are said to be borne saltire-wise.

Saltire.

Saltish (sălt'ish), a. Somewhat salt; tinged or impregnated moderately with salt. 'The saltish surge. Mir. for Mags.

Saltishly (sălt'ish-lĭ), adv. With a moderate degree of saltiness.

Saltishness (sălt'ish-nĕs), n. The state or quality of being saltish.

Salt-junk (sălt'jŭnk), n. Dry salt beef for use at sea.

Saltless (sălt'les), a. Destitute of salt; insipid.

Salt-lick (sălt'lik), n. A salt-spring. [United States.]

Saltily (sălt'i-lĭ), adv. In a salt manner; with the taste of salt.

Salt-marsh (sălt'mārsh), n. Land under pasture-grasses or herbage plants, subject to be overflowed by the sea, or by the waters of estuaries, or the outlets of rivers which, in consequence of proximity to the sea, are more or less impregnated with salt.

Salt-mine (sălt'mĭn), n. A mine where rock-salt is obtained.

Saltiness (sălt'nes), n. The quality or state of being salt or impregnated with salt; as, the saltiness of sea-water or of provisions. 'The difference between saltiness and bitterness.' Bacon.

Salt-pan (sălt'pan), n. A large shallow pan or vessel in which salt-water or brine is evaporated in order to obtain salt. The term is also applied, especially in the plural, to salt-works and to natural or artificial ponds or sheets of water in which salt is produced by evaporation.

Saltpetre (sălt'pĕ-tĕr), n. [Salt, and Gr. petros, a stone.] A salt, called also Nitre, and in chemical nomenclature Nitrate of Potassium or Potassic Nitrate. See NITRE.

Saltpetrous (sălt'pĕ-trus), a. Pertaining to saltpetre or partaking of its qualities; impregnated with saltpetre.

Salt-pit (sălt'pit), n. A pit where salt is got; a salt-pan.

Salt-radical (sălt-rad'i-kal), n. In chem. a simple or compound substance capable of combining with a metal or compound substance, as ammonium, which may take the place of a metal.

Salt-raker (sălt-rāk'ĕr), n. One employed in raking or collecting salt in natural salt-ponds or in inclosures from the sea. Simmonds.

Salt-rheum (sălt'rĕm), n. A vague and indefinite popular name applied to almost all the non-febrile cutaneous eruptions which are common among adults, except ringworm and itch.

Salt-water (sălt'wā-tĕr), n. Water impregnated with salt; sea-water.

Salt-water (sălt'wā-tĕr), a. Pertaining or relating to salt-water (that is, the sea); belonging to the sea; used at sea; as, salt-water phrases. 'Thou salt-water thief.' Shak.

Salt-work (sălt'wĕrk), n. A house or place where salt is made.

Saltwort (sălt'wĕrt), n. A popular name applied to the species of Salsola, and also to Salsicrion annua and Glaux maritima. See SALSOLA.

Salty (sălt'i), a. Somewhat salt; saltish.

Salubrious (sa-lŭ'bri-us), a. [L. salubris, salubris, from salus, health. Acin safe (which see).] Favourable to health; healthful; promoting health; as, salubrious air; a salubrious climate.

The warm limbeck draws Salubrious waters from the recent brood. S. Phillips.

The climate (of Simla) is considered highly salubrious. Thornton's Gaz. of India.

SYN. Healthful, wholesome, healthy, salutary.

Salubriously (sa-lŭ'bri-us-lĭ), adv. In a salubrious manner; so as to promote health.

Salubriousness, Salubrity (sa-lŭ'bri-us-nĕs, sa-lŭ'bri-tĭ), n. [L. salubritas.] The state or quality of being salubrious; wholesomeness; healthfulness; favourableness to the preservation of health; as, the salubrity of air, of a country or climate.

Salute, † v. t. [Fr. saluer, to salute.] To salute. Chaucer.

Salutarily (să-lŭ'tā-ri-lĭ), adv. In a salutary manner; favourably to health.

Salutariness (să-lŭ'tā-ri-nĕs), n. 1. The quality of being salutary or of contributing to health; wholesomeness. Johnson.—2. The quality of promoting good or prosperity.

Salutary (să-lŭ'tā-ri), a. [Fr. salutaire; L. salutaris, from salus, salubris, health, safety.] 1. Wholesome; healthful; promoting health.

The gardens, yards, and avenues are dry and clean; and so more salutary as more elegant. Ray.

2. Promotive of or contributing to some beneficial purpose.

He had no doubt passed salutary laws; but what assurance was there that he would not break them? Macaulay.

SYN. Wholesome, healthful, salubrious, beneficial, useful, advantageous, profitable.

Salutation (sa-lŭ'tā-tŭ'shŭn), n. [Fr., from L. salutatio. See SALUTE.] The act of saluting or paying respect or reverence by the customary words or actions; the act of greeting; also, that which is done or uttered in the act of saluting or greeting. It may consist in the expression of kind wishes, bowing, shaking hands, embracing, uncovering the head, or the like.

The early village cock Hath twice done salutation to the morn. Shak.

In all public meetings or private addresses, use the forms of salutation, reverence, and decency, usual among the most sober persons. Fen. Taylor.

SYN. Greeting, salute, address.

Salutatorian (sa-lŭ'tā-tŭ'tri-an), n. In the United States, the student of a college who pronounces the salutatory oration at the annual commencement or like exercises.

Salutatorily (sa-lŭ'tā-tŭ'tri-lĭ), adv. By way of salutation.

Salutatory (sa-lŭ'tā-tŭ'tri), a. Greeting. In the United States, an epithet applied to the oration which introduces the exercises of the commencements in colleges.

Salutatory† (sa-lŭ'tā-tŭ'tri), n. Place of greeting; a vestibule; a porch. 'Coming to the bishop with supplication into the salutatory, some out-porch of the church.' Milton.

Salute (sa-lŭt'), v. t. pret. & pp. saluted; ppr. saluting. [L. saluto, from L. salus, salubris, health. See SAFE.] 1. To address with expressions of kind wishes, or in order to show homage or courtesy; to greet; to hail. 'Salute thee for her king.' Shak.

If ye salute your brethren only, what do ye more than others? Mat. v. 47.

2. To greet with a kiss, a wave of the hand, an uncovering of the head, a bow, or the like; as, to pass a person without saluting him. Addison.—3. In the army or navy, to honour, as some day, person, or nation, by a discharge of great guns or small arms, by dipping colours, by shouts, or the like. See the noun.—4.† To contribute a healthful influence to; to benefit; to please; to gratify.

Would I had no being If this salute my blood a jot. Shak.

Salute (sa-lŭt'), v. i. To perform a salutation; to greet each other. 'Saw them salute on horseback.' Shak.

Salute (sa-lŭt'), n. 1. The act of expressing kind wishes or respect; salutation; greeting. O, what avails me now that honour high To have conceived of God, or that salute,—Hail, highly favoured, among women blest! Milton.

2. A kiss. 'There cold salutes, but here a lover's kiss.' Roscommon.—3. In the army and navy, a compliment paid when a royal or other distinguished personage presents himself, when squadrons or other bodies meet, when officers are buried, and on many other ceremonial occasions. There are many modes of giving a salute—firing cannon or small arms, dipping colours, flags, and topsails, presenting arms, manning the yards, cheering, &c. A royal salute consists in the firing of twenty-one guns, in the lowering by officers of their sword points, and the dipping of the colours. Such forms of salute as the firing of guns, lowering of swords, and presenting arms, alike render the ship or soldier so doing powerless for aggression at the time, and thus symbolize friendliness, or the voluntary putting of the party saluting into the power of the party saluted.

Have you manned the quay to give me the honour of a salute upon taking command of my ship? Sir W. Scott.

4. A gold coin, of the value of 25s., struck by Henry V. after his conquests in France. It was so named from the salutation represented on it, viz. the Virgin Mary holding a shield with the arms of France, and the angel holding another with the arms of France and England quarterly, with the word 'Ave!' (Hail!) in a scroll. Salutes were also coined in the reign of Henry VI.

Saluter (sa-lŭ'tĕr), n. One who salutes.

Salutiferous (sa-lŭ'tĭfĕr-us), a. [L. salutifer—salus, health, and fero, to bring.] Bringing health; healthy; salutary. 'The gentle salutiferous air of Montpellier.' Dennis. [Rare.]

Salutiferously (sa-lŭ'tĭfĕr-us-lĭ), adv. In a salutiferous manner. Cudworth. [Rare.]

Salvability (sal'va-bil'i-tĭ), n. The state of being salvable; the possibility of being saved.

Why do we Christians so fiercely argue against the salvability of each other, as if it were our wish that all should be damned but those of our particular sect? Dr. H. More.

Salvable (sal'va-blĭ), a. [From L. salvo, salvatum, to save, from salvus, safe.] Capable of being saved; admitting of salvation.

Our wild fancies about God's decrees have in event reprobated more than those decrees, and have bid fair to the damning of many whom those left salvable. Dr. H. More.

Salvableness (sal'va-blĭ-nĕs), n. State of being salvable.

Salvably (sal'va-blĭ), adv. In a salvable manner.

Salvadora (sal'va-dŏ'ra), n. A genus of plants, nat. order Salvadoraceæ. They have stems with slightly swollen joints, opposite entire leaves, and loose branching panicles of small flowers. S. persica is supposed to be the mustard plant of Scripture, which has very small seeds, and grows into a tree. Its fruit is succulent and tastes like garden cress. The bark of the root is acri.

Salvadoraceæ (sal'va-dŏ-rā'sĕ-ĕ), n. pl. A small nat. order of monopetalous dicotyledons, allied to Oleaceæ and Jasminaceæ. The few known species are found in India, Syria, and North Africa. The genus Salvadora is the type. See SALVADORA.

Salvage (sal'vāj), n. [Fr. from L. salvo, salvatum, from L. salvus, safe.] 1. The act of saving a ship or goods from extraordinary danger, as from the sea, fire, an enemy, or the like.—2. In commercial and maritime law, (a) an allowance or compensation to which those persons are entitled by whose voluntary exertions ships or goods have been saved from the dangers of the sea, fire, pirates, or enemies. The crew of a ship are not entitled to salvage for any extraordinary efforts they may have made in saving their own vessel. If the salvors and the parties from whom salvage is claimed cannot agree, a competent court has to fix the sum to be paid and adjust the proportions, which vary according to circumstances. (b) That portion of the property saved from danger or destruction by the extraordinary and voluntary exertions of the salvors.

Salvage† (sal'vāj), a. [O.Fr. salvage. See SAVEGE.] Salvage; rude; cruel.

Salvage† (sal'vāj), n. A savage or wild person.

Salvagesse† (sal'va-jes), n. Savageness; wildness. Spenser.

Salvatella (sal'va-tel'la), n. [It., dim. of L. salvator, from salvo, salvatum, to save.] A vein situated on the back of the hand, near its inner margin, so called because the ancients recommended it to be opened in certain diseases, as melancholic and hypochondriacal affections, the abstraction of blood from it having considerable efficacy in the cure of disease. Dunlopson.

Salvation (sal-vā'shon), n. [O.Fr. salvation, from L. salvo, salvatum, to save, from salvus, safe, same root as salvus, salutis, safety (whence salute).] 1. The act of saving; preservation from destruction, danger, or great calamity.—2. The redemption of man from the bondage of sin and liability to eternal death and the conferring on him everlasting happiness; attainment of eternal bliss; the bliss of heaven. 'To earn salvation for the sons of men.' Milton. 'High in salvation and the climes of bliss.' Milton.

Godly sorrow worketh repentance to salvation. 2 Cor. vii. 10.

3. Manifestation of saving power.

Fear ye not, stand still, and see the salvation of the Lord, which he will shew to you to-day. Ex. xiv. 13.

4. That which saves; the cause of saving.

The Lord is my light and my salvation. Ps. xxvii. 1.

Salvatory† (sal'va-to-ri), n. [Fr. salvatoire. See SALVATION.] A place where things are preserved; a repository. 'In what salvatories or repositories the species of things past are conserved.' Sir M. Hale.

Salve (sāv or salv), n. [A.Sax. sealf, a salve, an ointment; D. salve, Dan. salve, G. salbe, O.H.G. salba, salve, ointment. See verb.] 1. An adhesive composition or substance to be applied to wounds or sores; a healing ointment.—2. Help; remedy.

If they shall excommunicate me, hath the doctrine of meekness any salve for me then? Hammond.

Salve (sāv or salv), v.t. pret. & pp. salved; ppr. salving. [A.Sax. sealfan, from thenoun; cog. Dan. salve, O.Sax. and Goth. salbōn; from root sal, whence L. salvus, safe, &c.] 1. To apply salve to; to heal by applications or medicaments; to cure by some remedy. 'May salve the long-grown wounds.' Shak.

Many skillful leeches him abide
To salve his wounds. Spenser.

2. To help; to remedy.

But Ebrank salved both their infamies
With noble deeds. Spenser.

3. To help or remedy by a salve, excuse, or reservation. Milton. [Rare.]

Salve† (salv), v.t. [L. salve, hail, God save you.] To salute.

By this the stranger knight in presence came,
And goodly salved them. Spenser.

Salve (salv), v.t. [From the noun salve.] To save, as a ship or goods, from danger or destruction, as from shipwreck, fire, or the like; as, to salve a cargo. Scottsman newspaper.

2. Sacredness; solemnity; as, the sanctity of an oath. 'Nuptial sanctity, and marriage rites.' Milton.—3. A saint or holy being; a holy object of any kind. 'All the sanctities of heav'n.' Milton. [Rare.]

I murmur'd, as I cape along,

Of comfort clasp'd in truth reveal'd;

And loiter'd in the master's field,

And darken'd sanctities with song. Tennyson.

—Religion, Devotion, Piety, Sanctity. See

RELIGION.—SYN. Holiness, godliness, piety, devotion, goodness, purity, religiousness, sacredness, solemnity.

Sanctuarize (sang'k-tū-a-ri), v.t. pret. & pp. sanctuarized; ppr. sanctuarizing. [From sanctuary.] To shelter by means of a sanctuary or sacred privileges.

No place, indeed, should murder sanctuarize. Shak.

Sanctuary (sang'k-tū-a-ri), n. [Fr. sanctuaire; L. sanctuarium, from sanctus, sacred.] 1. A sacred or consecrated place; a holy spot; specifically, (a) in Script. the temple at Jerusalem, particularly the most retired part of it, called the Holy of Holies, in which was kept the ark of the covenant, and into which no person was permitted to enter except the high-priest, and that only once a year to intercede for the people. The same name was given to the corresponding part of the tabernacle in the wilderness. (b) A house consecrated to the worship of God; a place where divine service is performed; a church. Crowds in column'd sanctuaries. Tennyson. (c) The cella or sacred part of an Egyptian, Greek, or Roman temple. (d) In the Rom. Cath. Ch. the presbytery or that part of a church where the altar is placed. 2. A place of protection; a sacred asylum.

Our firesides must be our sanctuaries, our refuges from misfortune, our choice retreat from all the world. Goldsmith.

3. Right of affording such protection or shelter; the privilege attached to certain places in virtue of which criminals taking refuge in them are protected from the ordinary operation of the law. From the time of Constantine downwards certain churches have been set apart in many Catholic countries to be an asylum for fugitives from the hands of justice. In England, particularly down to the Reformation, any person who had taken refuge in a sanctuary was secured against punishment—except when charged with treason or sacrilege—if within the space of forty days he gave signs of repentance, and subjected himself to banishment. By the act 21 James I. xviii., the privilege of sanctuary for crime was finally abolished. Various sanctuaries, however, for debtors continued to exist in and about London till 1697, when they too were abolished. In Scotland the Abbey of Holyrood House and its precincts still retain the privilege of giving sanctuary to debtors. When a person retires to the sanctuary he is protected against personal diligence, which protection continues for twenty-four hours; but to enjoy it longer the person must enter his name in the books kept by the bailie of the abbey. From the abolition of imprisonment for debt this sanctuary is no longer used.

These laws, whoever made them, bestowed on temples the privilege of sanctuary. Milton.

4. Refuge in a sacred place; shelter; protection. 'Yield me sanctuary.' Tennyson.

The admirable works of painting were made fuel for the fire; but some reliques of it took sanctuary under ground, and escaped the common destiny. Dryden.

Sanctum (sang'k-tum), n. [L.] A sacred place; a private retreat or room; as, an editor's sanctum.—Sanctum sanctorum, 'the holy of holies.' The innermost or holiest place of the Jewish tabernacle or temple. See HOLY.

Sanctus (sang'k-tus), n. In music, an anthem beginning with the Latin word sanctus, holy.

Sanctus-bell (sang'k-tus-bel), n. In the R. Cath. Ch. same as Sacring-bell.

Sand (sand), n. [A. Sax. sand; Dan. Sw. and G. sand, Icel. sandr, D. zand. Probably from same root as L. sabulum, sand, gravel.] 1. Fine particles of stone, particularly of siliceous stone in a loose state, but not reduced to powder or dust; a collection of siliceous granules not coherent when wet.

Most of the sands which we observe are the ruins of disintegrated rocks, and are red, white, gray, or black, according to the rocks from which they were derived, such as granitic, porphyritic, and other crystalline rocks. Valuable metallic ores, as those of gold, platinum, tin, copper, iron, titanium, often occur in the form of sand or mixed with that substance. Pure siliceous sands are very valuable for the manufacture of glass, for making mortars, filters, ameliorating dense clay soils, for making moulds in founding, and many other purposes.—2. pl. Tracts of land consisting of sand, like the deserts of Arabia and Africa; also, tracts of sand exposed by the ebb of the tide; as, the Libyan sands; the Solway sands.—3. The sand in a sand-glass or hour-glass; hence, the time one has to live; period of life.

Now our sands are almost run. Shak.

The sands are numbered that make up my life. Shak.

Sand (sand), v.t. 1. To sprinkle with sand; specifically, to powder with sand, as a freshly painted surface, in order to make it resemble stone. See SANDED.—2. To drive upon a sand-bank.

Travellers and seamen, when they have been sanded or dashed on a rock, for ever after fear not that mischance only, but all such dangers whatsoever. Burton.

Sandal (san'dal), n. [Fr. sandale, L. sandalum, from Gr. sandalion, sandal.] 1. A kind of shoe, consisting of a sole fastened to the foot, generally by means of straps, Grecian and Roman Sandals.

crossed over and wound round the ankle. Originally sandals were made of leather, but they afterwards became articles of great luxury, being made of gold, silver, and other precious materials, and beautifully ornamented.—2. The official shoe of a bishop or abbot. They were commonly made of red leather, and sometimes of silk or velvet richly embroidered.—3. A tie or strap for fastening a shoe over the foot or round the ankle. 'Open-work stockings, and shoes with sandals.' Dickens.

Sandal (san'dal), n. Sandal-wood. 'Toys in lava, fans of sandal.' Tennyson.

Sandaliform (san'dal-i-form), a. Shaped like a sandal or slipper.

Sandalled (san'dald), p. and a. 1. Wearing sandals.—2. Shaped like a sandal or slipper; having the appearance of a sandal; fastening with a sandal. 'Her sandalled shoes in an old threadbare velvet reticule.' Dickens.

Sandal-wood (san'dal-wūd), n. [Ar. sandal, from Skr. chandana, sandal-wood.] The wood of several species of the genus Santalum, natives of the East Indies and tropical islands of the Pacific Ocean. S. album is a low tree, having a general resemblance to privet. When the tree becomes old, the harder central wood acquires a yellow colour and a strong scent which is very fatal to insects. On this account it is used for making cabinets, &c., which are very suitable for the preservation of such articles as are subject to the ravages of insects. Yellow sandal-wood is the produce of a different species, S. Freycinetianum, a native of the Sandwich Islands and Indian Archipelago, and from these regions the Chinese import it, chiefly for the purpose of burning it both in their temples and in their houses. See SANTALUM.—Red sandal-wood, or red sanders-wood, is the produce of a tree of the genus Pterocarpus, the P. santalinus, a native of India. It is used as a dye-wood, and as a slight astringent in medicine. The colouring principle is called santaline. (See PTEROCARPUS.) The Adenanthera pavonina, a native of the East Indies, and allied to the acacias, the chips of which yield a deep red dye, is sometimes called red sandal-wood.

Sandarach (san'da-rak), n. [L. sandaracha, from Gr. sandarakhē, sandarakhē, a word of Oriental origin; Ar. sandarīs, Per. sandarāh, Skr. sindūra, realgar.] 1. A resin in white tears, more transparent than those of mastic, which exudes from the bark of the sandarach-tree (Calitris quadrivalvis; Thyia articulata of some botanists). (See next article.) It is used as pounce powder for strewing over paper erasures (see POUNCE), as incense, and for making a pale varnish for light-coloured woods. Called also Juniper-resin.—2. In mineral. red sulphuret, or proto-sulphuret, of arsenic; realgar. Also spelled Sandarac.

Sandarach-tree (san'da-rak-trē), n. The Calitris quadrivalvis, a native of the mountains of Morocco. It is a large tree with straggling branches; the timber is fragrant, hard, durable, mahogany-coloured, and is largely used in the construction of mosques and similar buildings in the north of Africa. See SANDARACH.

Sand-bag (sand'bag), n. A bag filled with sand; as, (a) a bag of sand or earth, and used in a fortification for repairing breaches, &c. (b) A leathern cushion, tightly filled with fine sand, used by engravers to prop their work at a convenient angle, or to give free motion to a plate or cut in engraving curved lines, &c. (c) A form of ballast used in boats and balloons. (d) A bag of sand fastened to the end of a staff and formerly employed in the challenges of yeomen, instead of the sword and lance, the weapons of knights and gentlemen. Shak. (e) A bag of sand which used to be attached to a quintain (which see).

Sand-ball (sand'bal), n. A ball of soap mixed with fine sand for the toilet.

Sandbank (sand'bank), n. A bank of sand; especially, a bank of sand formed by tides or currents.

Sand-bath (sand'bath), n. 1. A vessel containing warm or hot sand, used as an equable heater for retorts, &c., in various chemical processes.—2. In med. a form of bath in which the body is covered with warm or sea sand.

Sand-bed (sand'bed), n. In metal, the bed into which the iron from the blast-furnace is run; the floor of a foundry in which large castings are made.

Sand-blast (sand'blast), n. A method of engraving and cutting glass and other hard materials by the percussive force of particles of sand driven by a steam or air blast. Called also Sand-jet.

Sand-blind (sand'blind), a. [Corrupted for sam-blind, sam being a Sax. prefix sām, half, cog. with L. semi, half.] Having defective or imperfect sight.

O heavens, this is my true-begotten father! who being more than sand-blind, high gravel-blind, knows me not. Shak.

Sand-blindness (sand'blind-nes), n. State of being sand-blind.

Sand-box (sand'boks), n. 1. A box with a perforated top or cover for sprinkling sand with sand.—2. A box filled with sand, usually placed in front of the driving-wheel of a locomotive, with a pipe to guide the sand to the rail when the wheels slip owing to frost, wet, &c.—3. A tree or plant of the genus Hura, the H. crepitans. (See HURA.) The fruits are of the shape shown in the cut, about the size of an orange, having a number of cells, each containing a seed. When ripe and dry they burst with a sharp report.

Fruit of the Sand-box Tree (Hura crepitans).

Sand-boy (sand'boy), n. A boy employed in carrying or carting sand.

Sand-canal (sand'ka-nal), n. In zool. the tube by which water is conveyed from the exterior to the ambulacral or locomotive system of the Echinodermata.

Sand-corn (sand'korn), n. A grain of sand.

Sand-crab (sand'krab), n. See OCYPODA.

Sand-crack (sand'krak), n. A fissure or perpendicular crack occurring in the hoof of a horse, the effect of which, if neglected, is to lame the horse.

Sand-drift (sand'drift), n. Drifting or drifted sand; a mound of drifted sand.

Sanded (sand'ed), p. and a. 1. Sprinkled with sand. 'The whitewashed wall, the nicely sanded floor.' Goldsmith.—2. Covered with sand.

The river pours along
Restless, roaring dreadful down it comes;
Then o'er the sanded valley floating spreads.
Thomson.

3. Of a sandy colour.

My hounds are bred out of the Spartan kind,
So few'd, so sanded, and their heads are hung
With ears that sweep away the morning dew.
Shak.

4. Short-sighted. [Provincial English.]

Sand-eel (sand'ēl), n. A name common to a family (Ammodytidae) of apodal (teleostean) fishes, and more specifically to the members of the genus Ammodytes. The body is slender and cylindrical, somewhat resembling that of an eel, and varying from 4 inches to about 1 foot in length, of a beautiful silvery lustre, destitute of ventral fins, and the scales hardly perceptible; the head is compressed, and the lower jaw larger than the upper. There are two British species, bearing the name of lance, viz. the Ammodytes tobianus, or wide-mouthed lance, and the A. alliciens or lancea, or small-mouthed lance. They are of frequent occurrence on our coasts, burying themselves in the sand to the depth of 6 or 7 inches during the time it is left dry by the ebb-tide, whence the former is dug out by fishermen for bait. They are delicate food.

Sand-eel (Ammodytes tobianus), ♂, Pectoral fin.

Sandemanian (san-dē-mā'ni-an), n. A follower of Robert Sandeman, a Scotch Antinomian theologian; one of the sect called Glassites. See GLASSITE.

Sandemanianism (san-dē-mā'ni-an-izm), n. The principles of the Sandemanians.

Sanderling (san'der-ling), n. [From sand, because it finds its food among the moist sands of the sea-shore.] A small wading bird, the Arenaria vulgaris, or Calidris arenaria, which frequents many of our shores. It attains a length of 8 inches, and in winter is of an ashen-gray hue on the upper parts and white below. The plumage is of a reddish brown, mottled with black in spring. It feeds on small marine insects, and differs from the sandpipers only in having no hinder-toe. Called also Ox-bird.

Sanders, Sanders-wood (san'dēr, san'dēr-wyð), n. See SANDAL-WOOD.

Sanders-blue (san'dēr-blū), n. Same as Saunders-blue.

Sandever (san'dē-vēr), n. Same as Sandiver.

Sand-flag (sand'flag), n. Sandstone of a lamellar or flaggy structure.

The face of that lofty cave is composed of the soft and crumbling stone called sand-flag, which gradually yields to the action of the atmosphere, and becomes split into large masses. Sir W. Scott.

Sand-flea (sand'fē), n. A small amphipodous crustacean of the genus Talitrus (T. locusta), common along most sea-shores. The sand-fleas swim on their side when in the water, and leap with great activity on land. They are sometimes found in great swarms, especially amongst sea-weed cast up on the beach. Called also Beach-flea and Sand-hopper.

Sand-flood (sand'flud), n. A vast body of sand moving or borne along the deserts of Arabia. Eruse.

Sand-fluke (sand'flük), n. See SAND-NECKER.

Sand-fly (sand'fi), n. A minute dipterous insect of the genus Simulium, family Tipulidae, and sub-order Nemocera. Their bite often causes painful swellings.

Sand-gall (sand'gal), n. Same as Sand-pipe.

Sand-glass (sand'glas), n. An hour-glass.

Sand-grass (sand'gras), n. Grass that grows on sandy soil as by the sea-shore. The name is peculiarly applied to those grasses which, by their wide-spreading and tenacious roots, enable the sandy soil to resist the encroachments of the sea.

The sand-grasses, Elymus arenarius, Aeluropus laticarpus, are valuable binding weeds on shifty sandy shores. Henfrey.

Sand-grouse (sand'grous), n. A genus (Pterocles) of gallinaceous birds, family Tetracnidae, closely allied to the grouse. They are natives chiefly of the warm parts of Asia and Africa, and are most abundant in arid sandy plains. Two species, the banded sand-grouse (P. arenarius) and the pin-tailed sand-grouse (P. setarius) are found in the south of Europe.

Sand-heat (sand'hēt), n. The heat of warm sand in chemical operations.

Sand-hill (sand'hil), n. A hill of sand, or a hill covered with sand. 'The sand-hills of the sea.' Shelley.

Sand-hopper (sand'hop-ēr), n. A small crustacean animal of the genus Talitrus. See SAND-FLEA.

Sandiness (sand'i-nes), n. 1. The state of being sandy.

Let such pretenders suspect the sandiness and hollowness of their foundation. South.

2. The state of being of a sandy colour.

Sandish (sand'ish), a. Approaching the nature of sand; loose; not compact. 'Fresh sandish earth.' Evelyn.

Sandiver (san'di-vēr), n. [A corruption of Fr. sel de verre, salt of glass.] The saline scum which is cast up from the materials of glass in fusion, and floating on the top is scummed off. It is used, when pulverized, as a polishing substance. Called also Sand-ever and Glass-gall.

Sandix (san'diks), n. [L. from Gr. sandyx, a bright red colour.] An old term applied to red-lead prepared by calcining carbonate of lead. Written also Sandyx.

Sand-jet (sand'jet), n. Same as Sand-blast.

Sand-lance, Sand-lance (sand'lans), n. Same as Sand-eel.

Sand-lizard (sand'liz-ērd), n. A saurian reptile (Lacerta agilis or L. stirpium) found on sandy heaths in Great Britain. It is about 7 inches long, variable in colour, but generally sandy-brown on the upper parts, with darker blotches interspersed, and having black rounded spots with a yellow or white centre on the sides.

Sand-martin (sand'mār-tin), n. A species of swallow, the Hirundo riparia. It is regarded as the smallest of the British swallows, is brown above and white below, with a dark-brown band on the breast. It is named from building its nest in the sandy banks of rivers and in gravel-pits. Also called the Bank Swallow.

Sand-mole (sand'mōl), n. See BATHYERGUS.

Sand-myrtle (sand'mēr-tl), n. The American name for a plant of the genus Lero-phylum, nat. order Ericaceae (heathworts), a native of New Jersey. It is a low, branched, evergreen shrub, with terminal clusters of small white flowers.

Sand-neck (sand'nek-ēr), n. A local name for a variety of plaice (Platessa limandoides). Called also Sand-fluke.

Sandoricum (san-dor'i-kum), n. [From santoor, the Malay name of the tree.] A genus of plants, nat. order Meliaceae. S. indicum, the only species, is an elegant tree of considerable size, found in the Molucca and Philippine Islands, as well as in the southern parts of India. The fruit is acid, and may be mixed with syrups to make cooling drinks. The root is bitter and is used in medicine.

Sand-paper (sand'pā-pēr), n. Paper covered on one side with a fine gritty substance for smoothing and polishing wood-work.

Sand-picture (sand'pik-tūr), n. A picture formed by arranging sand of various tints

ch, chain; ch, Sc. loch; g, go; j, job;

h, Fr. ton; ng, sing; TH, then; th, thin;

w, wig; wh, whig; zh, azure.—See KEY.

on a glutinous ground so that the general effect is similar to that of a coloured picture.

Sand-pipe (sand'pīp), n. In geol. a name given to long, perpendicular, cylindrical hollows, tapering to a point, penetrating sometimes deeply into the chalk, and so called from being filled with sand, gravel, or clay. Such pipes may have taken their origin from the rotatory motion of stones drilling holes in the chalk, but they have probably been continued by the slow action of water charged with carbonic acid penetrating the holes, and perhaps deepened in modern times by the action of humic acid derived from the roots of trees. Called also Sand-gall.

Sandpiper (sand'pī-pēr), n. A name applied to several gallatorial birds of the family Longirostres, and of the genera Tringa, Totanus, Pelidna, Actitis, &c. They are all shore birds allied to the snipe, ruff, plover, curlew, godwit, &c., with whom they constitute the family Scolopacidae of some writers. The knot (Tringa Canutus), known variously as the red sandpiper or ash-coloured sandpiper, in accordance with the varying hue of its plumage, is about 10 inches in length, appearing off our coasts in great flocks in winter. The common sandpiper or summer-pipe (Totanus hypoleucis) visits us in summer. The green sandpiper (Totanus ochropus), on the contrary, leaves us for the north in summer. The little sandpiper or little stint (Tringa minuta), an Indian and South African bird, is occasionally seen in Britain. The purple sandpiper (Tringa maritima), a native of Greenland, Spitzbergen, &c., is also a summer visitant. The dunlin, greenshank, and redshanks are also known as sandpipers. Sand-pipers of various species are abundant in North America, and in winter in the West Indies.

Sand-prey, Sand-pride (sand'prā, sand'prīd), n. The mud-lamprey (the Ammocoetes branchialis). It rarely exceeds 6 or 7 inches in length, is of a yellowish-brown colour, has a horse-shoe shaped mouth, and is considered peculiar to the rivers of England and Scotland.

Sand-pump (sand'pūmp), n. A cylindrical metallic case or tube having at the bottom a valve opening inwardly and used for removing the sand which collects in the bore when a well, &c., is being drilled. On the drill being temporarily removed the sand-pump is lowered, the water and dirt force up the valve and enter the tube, the valve dropping again to prevent their return. This being repeated again and again the tube becomes filled, on which it is drawn to the surface and emptied.

Sand-rock (sand'rōk), n. A rock composed of cemented sand.

Sand-shot (sand'shot), n. Small cast-iron balls, such as grape, canister, or case, cast in sand, larger balls being cast in iron moulds.

Sand-smelt (sand'smelt), n. A fish, the Atherina presbyter. Called also Atherine. See ATHERINE.

Sand-star (sand'stār), n. A star-fish of the genus Ophiura, order Ophiuroidea, having five long slender arms attached to a circular disc.

Sandstone (sand'stōn), n. Stone composed of agglutinated grains of sand, which may be calcareous, siliceous, or of any other mineral nature. Sandstone is in most cases chiefly composed of particles of quartz, united by a cement. The cement is in variable quantity, and may be calcareous or marly, argillaceous or argillo-ferruginous, or even siliceous. The grains of quartz are sometimes scarcely distinguishable by the naked eye, and sometimes are equal in size to a nut or an egg, as in those sandstones called conglomerates, or sometimes pudding-stone or breccia. The texture of some sandstones is very close, while in others it is very loose and porous. Some sandstones have a slaty structure, and have been called sandstone slate. In colour sandstone varies from gray to reddish-brown, in some cases uniform, in others variegated. In addition to quartz some sandstones contain grains of felspar, flint, and siliceous slate, or plates of mica. Some sandstones are ferruginous, containing an oxide or the carbonate of iron. Sandstone, though a secondary rock, has been formed at different periods and under different circumstances, and is hence associated with different rocks or formations. It is in general distinctly stratified, and the beds horizontally arranged, but sometimes they are much inclined, or even vertical. Sandstone in some of its varieties is very useful in the arts, and is often known by the name of freestone. When sufficiently solid it is employed as a building stone. Some varieties are used as millstones for grinding meal, or for wearing down other materials preparatory to a polish, and some are used for wheelstones.—New red sandstone, in geol., a series of brick-red strata lying immediately above the Permian strata. The new red sandstone system, as at first designated, included two groups of rocks, the one containing fossils belonging to the paleozoic age, the other inclosing mesozoic remains. These have, therefore, been separated, and the name Permian given to the older and lower group, and that of trassic or new red sandstone to the newer and upper. (See PERMIAN, TRIASSIC.) The trias of England consists of red sandstones, conglomerates, and marls, with a small admixture of dolomite and important beds of rock-salt. In Germany it contains the Muschelkalk.—Old red sandstone, a group of strata, chiefly sandstones and conglomerates, whose universally red colour suggested their name. They are largely developed on the borders of Wales, in the Cambrian district, the central valley of Scotland, along the shores of the Moray Firth, the county of Caithness, and the Orkneys. The lower strata pass into the upper Silurian, the upper beds pass into the carboniferous, a middle group being recognized only in the north of Scotland. Fossils are few in comparison to the thickness of the strata. But from the fossils and the red colour of the beds Sir Andrew C. Ramsay infers that they were formed in land-locked continental basins; they would thus represent the great land surfaces which replaced the Silurians, and were in turn replaced by the carboniferous seas. The marine deposits of the old red sandstone period are represented by the Devonians of England and the Continent; Devonian and old red sandstone are not therefore synonymous. In Russia the same beds contain Devonian and old red sandstone fossils. Perhaps the name may disappear, the members of the group being referred to the Silurian and carboniferous formations, with which they are respectively conformable. See DEVONIAN.

Sand-storm (sand'stōrm), n. A violent commotion of sand caused by wind.

Sand-sucker (sand'suk-ēr), n. The same as Sand-neck.

Sand-tube (sand'tūb), n. A tube made of sand; specifically, a vitrified tube of sand produced by lightning; a fulgurite.

Sand-wasp (sand'wasp), n. A hymenopterous insect of the genus Ammophila, belonging to a group which, from their peculiar habits, are termed *Fossore*s or diggers. The sand-wasp inhabits sunny banks in sandy situations, running among grass, &c., with great activity, and continually vibrating its antennae and wings. The female is armed with a sting.

Sandwich (sand'wich), n. [After an Earl of Sandwich, who brought it into fashion.] 1. Two thin slices of bread, plain or buttered, with some savoury food, as sliced or potted meat, fish, or the like, flavoured with mustard, &c., between.

Claret, sandwich, and an appetite,
Are things which make an English evening pass.
Byron.

Hence—2. Anything resembling a sandwich; something dissimilar placed between two other things, as a man carrying two advertising-boards, one before and one behind, a man placed between two ladies, or the like.

A pale young man with feeble whiskers and a stiff white neckcloth came walking down the lane en sandwich—having a lady, that is, oneacharm. Thackeray.

Sandwich (sand'wich), v.t. To make into a sandwich; to insert between something dissimilar, in the manner of the meat in a sandwich; to fit between other parts. [Colloq.]

Sand-worm (sand'wērm), n. A name applied to various species of annelides that inhabit sand.

Sandwort (sand'wērt), n. The common name of several British species of plants of the genus Arenaria, nat. order Caryophyllaceae. They are found growing in sandy situations, but are of no value.

Sandy (sand'y), a. 1. Consisting of or abounding with sand; full of sand; covered or sprinkled with sand; as, a sandy desert or plain; a sandy road or soil. 'The sandy hour-glass.' Shak.—2. Resembling sand; hence, unstable; shifting; not firm or solid.

Favour, so bottomed upon the sandy foundation of personal respects only, cannot be long lived. Bacon.

3. Of the colour of sand; of a yellowish-red colour; as, sandy hair.

Sandy-laverock (sand'y-lā'vēr-ok), n. A bird, the sanderling. Sir W. Scott. [Scotch.]

Sandxy. See SANDIX.

Sane (sān), a. [L. sanus, sound, whole, healthy. Same root as Gr. saos, sōs, safe and sound.] 1. Mentally sound; not disordered in mind; not deranged; having the regular exercise of reason and other faculties of the mind; as, a sane person; a person of a sane mind.

I woke sane, but well-nigh close to death. Tennyson.

2. Healthy. [Rare.]

Saneness (san'nes), n. State of being sane or of sound mind; sanity.

Sang (sang), pret. of sing.

Sang (sang), n. A song. [Scotch.]

Sang (sang), n. In the United States, a corruption of ginseng.

Sangaree (sang'gā-rē), n. [From Sp. sangría, a beverage made with red wine, from sangre, blood, from L. sanguis, blood (whence sanguinary)] Wine and water sweetened and spiced, and sometimes iced: often used as a refreshing drink in warm countries.

Sangaree (sang'gā-rē), v.t. To reduce in strength and sweeten: applied to fermented liquors, as wine, ale, &c.

Sangaree (sang'gā-rē), v.i. To drink sangaree. 'Sangareed with bearded Tartars in the mountains of the moon.' Aytoun.

Sang-froid (sang'frwā), n. [Fr., cold blood.] Freedom from agitation or excitement of mind; coolness; indifference; calmness in trying circumstances.

There he stood with such sang-froid, that greater
Could scarce be shown even by a mere spectator.
Byron.

Sangiac (san'ji-ak), See SANJAK.

Sangiacate (san'ji-a-kāt), See SANJAKATE.

Sangler (sang'l-ēr), n. [Fr.] In her: a wild boar.

Sangraal (sang-rā'al), n. Same as Sangreal.

Sangreal (sang-rā'al), n. [Lit. holy dish, the san-being from L. sanctus, holy. See GRAIL.] The holy vessel from which our Lord ate the paschal lamb or dispensed the wine at the last supper. See GRAIL.

Sangu (sang'gu), n. The native name of the Abyssinian ox, characterized by the great size of its horns.

Sanguiferous (sang'gwīf-ēr-us), a. [L. sanguifer—sanguis, blood, and fero, to carry.] Conveying blood; as, sanguiferous vessels, that is, the arteries and veins. Derham.

Sanguification (sang'gwī-fī-kā'shon), n. [Fr., from L. sanguis, blood, and facio, to make.] The production of blood; the conversion of chyle into blood. Arbuthnot.

Sanguifier (sang'gwī-fī-ēr), n. A producer of blood. Sir J. Floyer.

Sanguifluous (sang'gwīflū-us), a. [L. sanguis, blood, and fluo, to flow.] Floating or running with blood.

Sanguify (sang'gwī-fi), v.i. pret. sanguified; ppr. sanguifying. [L. sanguis, blood, and facio, to make.] To produce blood. Sir M. Hale.

Sanguigenous (sang'gwī'en-us), a. [L. sanguis, blood, and gignere or gignere, to produce.] Producing blood; as, sanguigenous food. Gregory.

Sanguin (sang'gwin), a. See SANGUINE.

Sanguinaria (sang'gwī-nā'ri-a), n. [From L. sanguis, sanguis, blood—all the parts of the plant yielding a red juice when cut or broken.] A genus of plants, nat. order Papaveraceae. The S. canadensis is the puccoon or blood-root of North America; a tuberous-rooted perennial with a single-stalked leaf and solitary white flowers. It is emetic and purgative in large doses, and in smaller quantities is stimulant, diaphoretic, and expectorant.

Sanguinarily (sang'gwin-a-ri-lī), adv. In a sanguinary manner; bloodthirstily.

Sanguinarity (sang'gwin-a-ri-nes), n. Quality of being sanguinary.

Sanguinary (sang'gwin-a-ri), a. [L. sanguinarius, from sanguis, blood; Fr. sanguinaire.] 1. Consisting of blood; formed of blood; as, a sanguinary stream.—2. Bloody; attended with much bloodshed; murderous; as, a sanguinary war, contest, or battle.—3. Bloodthirsty; cruel; eager to shed blood.

Passion . . . makes us brutal and sanguinary.
Broome.

The code of laws is sanguinary in the extreme.
Brougham.

SYN. Bloody, murderous, bloodthirsty, savage, cruel.

Sanguinary (sang'gwin-a-ri), n. [L. sanguinaria herba, an herb that stanches blood.

Fāde, fār, fat, fall; mē, met, hēr; pine, pin; nōte, not, mōve; tūbe, tub, lūll; oil, pound; ū. Sc. abume; y, Sc. fey.

See above.] A plant, Achillea millefolium. See MILFOIL.

Sanguine (sang'gwin), a. [Fr. sanguin; L. sanguineus, from sanguis, blood.] 1. Having the colour of blood; red; as, a sanguine colour or countenance. 'The sanguine colour of the leaves' (of a rose). Shak.

Sanguine he was; a but less vivid hue Than of that islet in the chesnut-bloom Flamed in his cheek. Tennyson.

2. Abounding with blood; plethoric; characterized by fullness of habit, vigour, muscularity, activity of circulation, &c.; as, a sanguine habit of body; a person of a sanguine temperament (as opposed to the phlegmatic, melancholic, &c., temperaments). — 3. Cheerful; warm; ardent; as, a sanguine temper. — 4. Anticipating the best; not desponding; confident; as, he is sanguine in his expectations of success. — 5. In her same as Murray (which see). It is expressed in engraving by diagonal lines crossing each other. — SYN. Warm, ardent, animated, lively, confident, hopeful.

Sanguine (sang'gwin), n. 1. Blood colour. 2. Bloodstone, with which cutlers stained the hilts of swords, &c.

Sanguine (sang'gwin), v.t. pret. & pp. sanguined; ppr. sanguining. 1. To stain with blood; to ensanguine. 'Ill sanguined with an innocent's blood.' Fanshawe. — 2. To stain or varnish with a blood colour. 'What rapier? gilt, silvered, or sanguined.' Minshew.

Sanguineless (sang'gwin-less), a. Destitute of blood; pale. [Rare.]

Sanguinely (sang'gwin-li), adv. In a sanguine manner; ardently; with confidence of success. 'Too sanguinely hoping to shine on in their meridian.' Chesterfield.

Sanguineous (sang'gwin-nes), n. The state or quality of being sanguine; as, (a) redness; colour of blood in the skin; as, sanguineous of countenance. (b) Fullness of blood; plethora; as, sanguineous of habit. (c) Ardour; heat of temper; confidence. 'Natural courage or sanguineousness of temper.' Dr. H. More.

Sanguineous (sang'gwin-és), a. [L. sanguineus. See SANGUINE.] 1. Appertaining to the blood; bloody. 'Sanguineous particles.' Sir T. Browne. — 2. Abounding with blood; plethoric; sanguine, as to temperament. Arbutnot. — 3. Confident; ardent. — 4. Of a red or blood colour; crimson. 'A hue fierce and sanguineous.' Keats.

Sanguinity (sang'gwin-ti), n. Sanguineousness. Swift.

Sanguinivorous, Sanguivorous (sang'gwin-iv-o-rus, sang'gwin-o-rus), a. [L. sanguis, sanguinis, blood, and voro, to eat.] Eating or subsisting on blood.

Sanguinolency† (sang'gwin-ó-len-si), n. Bloodiness; thirst for blood. 'That great red dragon with seven heads, so called from his sanguinolency.' Dr. H. More.

Sanguinolent (sang'gwin-ó-lent), a. [L. sanguinolentus.] Tinged or mingled with blood; bloody. Dunglison.

Sanguisorba (sang'gwi-sor'ba), n. [From L. sanguis, blood, and sorbeo, to absorb; S. officinalis was formerly supposed to be a powerful vulnerary.] A genus of plants, the type of the sub-order Sanguisorbeae, in the nat. order Rosaceae. Of this genus there are several species, most of which possess astringent properties. The common burnet (S. officinalis) is a native of Britain, growing in moist pastures, and having smooth pinnate leaves and terminal ovate heads of small dark-purple flowers.

Sanguisorbeae (sang'gwi-sor'bé-é), n. pl. One of the sub-orders of the nat. order Rosaceae, consisting of herbaceous or undershrubby exogens. It is distinguished from Rosaceae proper by the constantly apetalous flowers, indurated calyx, and solitary, or almost solitary, carpels.

Sanguisuga (sang'gwi-sú-ga), n. [L., a leech — sanguis, blood, and sugo, to suck.] A genus of abrancheate annelids, of which the medicinal leech (S. medicinalis) is the type. S. officinalis is the Hungarian or green leech used in the south of Europe. See LEECH.

Sanguisuge (sang'gwi-súj), n. The blood-sucker; a leech or horse-leech. See SANGUISUGA.

Sanhedrim (san'he-drim), n. [Heb. sanhedrin, from Gr. synedrion — syn, with, together, and hedra, seat.] The great council among the Jews, whose jurisdiction extended to all important affairs. They received appeals from inferior tribunals, and had power of life and death. The sanhedrim had a president, generally the high-priest, and a vice-president. The other members consisted of chief-priests, elders, and scribes, in all amounting to seventy-one or seventy-two, including the high-priest. Written also Sanhedrin.

Sanhita (san'hi-ta), n. [Hind.] The name of that portion of the Vedas, or sacred writings of the Brahmans, which contains the mantra or hymns.

Sanicle (san'i-kl), n. [Fr. sanicle, from L. sano, to heal—from the supposed healing virtues of Sanicula europaea.] A plant of the genus Sanicula (which see).

Sanicula (sa-nik-ú-la), n. A genus of plants belonging to the nat. order Umbelliferae. S. europaea (wood-sanicle or self-heal) is found in Britain growing in woods. It is now totally neglected as an official plant. It has palmate, smooth, glossy leaves, and umbellate heads of minute pinkish flowers.

Sanidine (san'i-din), n. Glassy felspar, nearly allied to common felspar.

Sanies (sá-ni-éz), n. [L. bloody matter.] A thin reddish discharge from wounds or sores; a serous matter, less thick and white than pus, and having a slight tinge of red.

Sanify (san'i-fi), v.t. [L. sanus, healthy, and facio, to make.] To make healthy; to improve in sanitary conditions. [Rare.]

When this is achieved voluntary celibacy will become discreditable, and the premature deaths of the bread-winners disappear before sanified cities and vanishing intemperance. W. R. Greg Sanious (sá-ni-us), a. [L. saniosus, from sanies.] 1. Pertaining to sanies, or partaking of its nature and appearance; thin and serous, with a slight bloody tinge; as, the sanious matter of an ulcer. — 2. Excreting or effusing a thin serous reddish matter; as, a sanious ulcer.

Sanitarian (san-i-tá-ri-an), n. A promoter of, or one versed in, sanitary measures or reforms.

Sanitarist (san'i-ta-ríst), n. One who advocates sanitary measures; one especially interested in sanitary measures or reforms.

Sanitarium (san-i-tá-ri-um), n. A health retreat; specifically, a resort or retreat for convalescents or others in tropical climates. 'Simla, the first sanitarium in India.' Duncan (Geog. of India). See SANATORIUM.

Sanitary (san'i-tá-ri), a. [Fr. sanitaire, from L. sanitas, health, soundness of body or mind, from sanus, sound. See SANE.] Pertaining to or designed to secure a healthy state; relating to the preservation of health; hygienic; as, sanitary laws or reform; sanitary science. 'These great and blessed plans for what is called sanitary reform.' Kingsley. — Sanitary, Sanatory. These two words are not unfrequently confounded. Sanitary, from L. sanitas, health, has the general meaning of pertaining to health; hygienic. Sanatory, from L. sano, to make healthy, means pertaining to healing or curing; therapeutic; as, the sanitary condition of the town was bad; sanatory medicines or agencies.

Sanitation (san-i-tá-shon), n. The adoption of sanitary measures conducing to preserve the health of a community. Synonymous with Hygiene.

Sanitist (san'i-tíst), n. Same as Sanitarist. Examiner newspaper.

Sanitory (san'i-to-ri), a. Sanitary. [Rare.] 'Estimating in a sanitory point of view the value of any health station.' Sir J. D. Hooker.

Sanity (san'i-ti), n. [L. sanitas. See SANE.] The state or quality of being sane; soundness or healthiness of mind; saneness; as, there is no question as to his sanity.

Sanjak (san'jak), n. [Turk., a standard.] A subdivision of an eyalet or minor province of Turkey, so called because the governor of such district, called sanjak-beg, is entitled to carry in war a standard of one horse-tail. Spelled also Sangiac.

Sanjakate (san'jak-át), n. A territorial division of the Turkish Empire; a sanjak. Written also Sangiacate.

Sank (sangk), pret. of sink.

Sanikhyā (sang'khyā), n. [Skr., synthetic reasoning.] The name of one of the three great systems of Hindu philosophy. It teaches how eternal happiness, or complete exemption from ill, can be obtained.

Sannah (san'na), n. The name of certain kinds of India muslin.

Sanpan (san'pan), n. Same as Sampun.

Sans (sanz), prep. [Fr., O. Fr. sens, from L. sine, without.] Without; deprived of. 'Sans teeth, sans eyes, sans taste, sans everything.' Shak.

I am blest with a wife, heav'n make me thankful, Inferior to none, sans pride I speak it. Beau. & Fl.

Sans-culotte (sanz-ky-lot'), n. [Fr., without breeches.] 1. A fellow without breeches; a ragged fellow. The name sans-culottes was given in derision to the popular party by the aristocratical in the beginning of the French revolution of 1789, and was afterwards assumed by the patriots as a title of honour. Hence — 2. A term applied to a fierce republican of any country.

Sans-culotterie (sanz-ky-lot'ré), n. [Fr.] The party, class, or opinions of the sans-culottes.

Sans-culottic (sanz-ky-lot'ik), a. Pertaining to or involving sans-culottism; revolutionary; republican. Carlyle.

Sans-culotism (sanz-ky-lot'izm), n. The principles of the sans-culottes; extreme republicanism.

The French Revolution, or third act, we may well call the final one; for, lower than that savage sans-culottism men cannot go. Carlyle.

Sans-culottist (sanz-ky-lot'ist), n. A sans-culotte; a revolutionist; a rabid republican.

Sansevera (san'sev-i-é-ra), n. [After Sansever, a Swedish botanist.] A genus of liliaceous plants found on the coasts of Western Africa, of Ceylon, and other eastern islands, as well as of India. They have sword-shaped sheathing leaves and simple spikes of small greenish flowers. The species are remarkable for the strength and fineness of the fibres of their leaves, which are made into bow-strings by the natives, and might be manufactured into cordage, especially the fibres of the leaves of S. Roxburghiana, abundant in the southern parts of India. (See BOWSTRING-HEMP.) S. zeylanica, a native of Ceylon, is often confounded with this species, but is much smaller.

Sanskrit, Sanscrit (san'skrit), n. [From Skr. sam (= Gr. syn), with, and krita, done, made, perfected, from kri, to make. The union of sam with kri produces a compound which signifies to polish, adorn, to perfect, and the name was given to express its superiority to the vernacular dialect, the Prakrit (that is, common, natural).] The ancient language of the Hindus, being that in which most of their vast literature is written, from the oldest portion of the Vedas (supposed to date from about 1500 B.C.) downward, though it has long ceased to be a living and spoken language. It is one of the Aryan or Indo-European family of tongues, and may be described as an elder sister of the Persian, Greek, and Latin, Teutonic, Slavonic, and Celtic tongues. It stands in the same relation to the modern Aryan languages of India as Latin stands to the Romance languages. It is a highly inflected language, having in this respect many resemblances to Greek. To philologists it has proved perhaps the most valuable of tongues; indeed, it was only after it became known to Europeans (towards the end of last century) that philology began to assume the character of a science. Its supreme value is due to the transparency of its structure, and its freedom from the corrupting and disguising effect of phonetic change, and from obliteration of the original meaning of its vocabularies. The earliest Sanskrit of the Vedas differs considerably from that of the later literature, and which is still employed for literary purposes.

Sanskritist, Sanscritist (san'skrit-ist), n. A person distinguished for attainments in Sanskrit.

Santalaceæ (san-ta-lā'sē-ē), n. pl. A nat. order of apetalous exogenous plants. They are shrubs or herbs, often parasitic on roots or branches, with opposite or alternate ex-stipulate leaves, and a one-celled ovary with dry or fleshy albumen. In the form of weeds the genera are found in Europe and North America; in Australia, the East Indies, and the South Sea Islands they exist as large shrubs or small trees. The most valuable genus is Santalum (which see).

Santaline (san'ta-lin), n. The colouring matter of red sandal or sanders wood, which may be obtained by evaporating the alcoholic infusion to dryness. It is a red resin, fusible at 212°, and is very soluble in acetic acid, as well as in alcohol, essential oils, and alkaline lyes.

Santalum (san'ta-lum), n. [L. See SANDAL-WOOD.] A genus of plants, nat. order Santalaceæ, and the type of that order. One or more species yield the sandal-wood of commerce. See SANDAL-WOOD.

Santer (san'tēr), An occasional spelling of Sauter.

Santhee (san'tē), n. An Indian measure for land, varying all over the country. In some districts it is as much as can be ploughed by two bullocks, in some by three, and in some by four.

Santon, Santoon (san'ton, san'tōn), n. An eastern priest, a kind of dervish, regarded by the people as a saint.

The dervish and other santouns or enthusiasts... express their zeal by turning round so long together, and with such swiftness, as will hardly be credited.

Sir T. Herbert.

Santonin Acid (san-ton'ik as'id), n. Same as Santonin (which see).

Santonin, Santonine (san'tō-nin), n. [Gr. santonion, wormwood.] ($C_{15}H_{15}O_5$.) A proximate principle, possessing acid properties, obtained from the seeds of southernwood (Artemisia santonica). It is colourless, crystallizable, and soluble in alcohol, and in the fixed and volatile oils, and is one of the most efficacious vermifuges.

Santorin (san'tō-rin), n. An argillaceous mineral occurring on the island of Santorin, yielding an excellent cement. It consists of 68.5 per cent silica, 5.5 ferric oxide, 13.3 alumina, 0.7 manganous oxide, 2.3 lime, 3.1 potash, 4.7 soda, with traces of common salt, sodic sulphate, and organic matter.

Saouari, Souari-wood (sou-ā-rē, sou-ā-rē-wūd), n. An excellent timber for ship-building, obtained from the Caryocarp nuciferum and C. tomentosum, nat. order Rhizophoraceæ, which yield also the delicious souari nuts. They are natives of tropical America. See CARYOCAR.

Sap (sap), n. [A. Sax. sæp, D. sap, L. G. sapp, juice; Ice. saft, Dan. and G. saft, juice, sap.] By some the Anglo-Saxon, Dutch, and Low-German forms are derived from L. sapa, must boiled thick.] 1. The juice or fluid which circulates in all plants, being as indispensable to vegetable life as the blood to animal life. It is the first product of the digestion of plant food, and contains the elements of vegetable growth in a dissolved condition. The absorption of nutriment from the soil is effected by the minute root-hairs and papillæ, the absorbed nutriment being mainly composed of carbonic acid and nitrogenous compounds dissolved in water. This ascending, or as it is termed crude sap, is apparently transmitted through the long cells in the vascular tissue of the stem and branches to the leaves, passing from cell to cell by the process known as endosmosis. In the leaves is effected the process of digestion or assimilation with the following results:—(a) the chemical decomposition of the oxygenated matter of the sap, the absorption of carbon dioxide (carbonic acid), and the liberation of pure oxygen at the ordinary atmospheric temperature. (b) A counter operation by which oxygen is absorbed from the air, and carbon dioxide exhaled. (c) The transformation of the remaining crude sap into organic substances which enter into the composition of the plant. This change is effected in the chlorophyll cells of the leaves under the influence of light, and the assimilated, or as it is termed elaborated sap, descends through the branches and stem to the growing parts of the plant requiring the same, there to be used up, after undergoing a series of changes included under the name metastasis, or to form deposits of reserve material lodged in various parts for future use. The ascent of the sap is one of the most wonderful phenomena of spring, and apparently depends not so much on the state of the weather, for it begins in the depth of winter, as on the plant having had its sufficient term of rest, and being, therefore, constrained by its very nature to renewed activity.—2. The juice or fluid in any substance, the presence of which is characteristic of a healthy, fresh, or vigorous condition; blood. 'Did drain the purple sap from her sweet brother's body.' Shak. 3. The albumen of a tree; the exterior part of the wood, next to the bark; sap-wood.

Sap (sap), n. A simpleton; a ninny; a milk-sop. [Scotch and school slang.]

He maun be a saft sap, wi' a head nae better than a fozy frosted turnip.

Sir W. Scott.

Sap (sap), v. i. To act like a sap; to play the part of a ninny or a soft fellow. [Slang.]

'They say he is the cleverest boy in the school. But then he saps.'—'In other words,' said Mr. D., with proper parsonic gravity, 'he understands he was sent to school to learn his lessons, and he learns them. You call that sapping. I call it doing his duty.'

Lord Lytton.

Sap (sap), v. t. pret. & pp. sapped; ppr. sapping. [Fr. saper, from sape, a kind of bill or mattock; It. zappa, a spade; zappone, a mattock, from L. L. sappa, a mattock.] 1. To cause to fall or render unstable by digging or wearing away the foundation; to undermine.

Nor safe their dwellings were, for sapp'd by floods, Their houses fell upon their household gods.

Dryden.

2. To subvert by removing the foundation of; to destroy as if by some secret, hidden, or invisible process; as, intrigue and corruption sap the constitution of a free government. 'Sapping a solemn creed with solemn sneer.' Byron. 'The grief that saps the mind.' Tennyson.—3. Milit. To pierce with saps.

Sap (sap), v. i. To proceed by secretly undermining.

Both assaults are carried on by sapping. Tatler.

Sap (sap), n. [Fr. sape. See above.] Milit. a narrow ditch or trench by which approach is made to a fortress or besieged place when within range of fire. The trench is formed by trained men (sappers), who place gabions as a cover, filled with the earth taken from the trench along the intended line of parapet; the earth excavated, after the gabions have been filled, being thrown towards the fortress, to form a parapet capable of resisting artillery. The single sap has only a single parapet; the double has one on each side. A sap is usually made by four men working together, and is generally a dangerous operation.

Sapadillo (sap-a-dil'lō), n. Same as Sapodilla.

Sapajou, Sajou (sap'a-jō, sā'jō), n. [Fr. sapajou, sajou, Braz. sajassu.] The name generally given to a group of South American platyrrhine, prehensile-tailed monkeys, including fifteen or sixteen species, whose characteristics it is exceedingly difficult properly to define. Among the species may be named the Cebus fatuellus, or horned sapajou (also called horned capucine); the C. monachus, and C. capucinus, often called the capucine. One of the most common species is the weeper (Cebus apella). The fur is rather rich, inclining to olive, and the face is bordered with a paler circle, varying considerably in shading and breadth. This species has been known to breed in confinement. The sapajous are very active, and climb well. They are small in size, playful in disposition, leading a gregarious life, and feeding chiefly on fruits and insects.

Capucine Sapajou (Cebus capucinus).

Sapan-wood (sa-pan'wūd), n. See SAPPAN-WOOD.

Sap-ball (sap'bal), n. A local name for those species of Polypori that grow on trees, but more specifically applied to Polyporus squamosus, abounding on decayed ash-trees, the stems of which are sometimes used as a foundation for tennis-balls. It is sometimes used for razor-strops.

Sap-colour (sap'kul-ēr), n. An expressed vegetable juice inspissated by slow evaporation, for the use of painters, as sap-green, &c.

Sape, Saip (sāp), n. Soap. [Scotch.]

Sape-faggot (sap'fag-ōt), n. Milit. a fascine about 3 feet long, used in sapping, to close the crevices between the gabions before the parapet is made.

Sapful (sap'fūl), a. Full of sap; containing sap; sappy. Colebridge.

Sap-green (sap'grēn), n. A pigment prepared by evaporating the juice of the berries of the Rhamnus catharticus, or buckthorn, to dryness, mixed with lime. It is soluble in water; acids redden it, but the alkalies and alkaline earths restore the green colour. It is used by water-colour painters as a green pigment. Called also Bladder-green.

Saphead (sap'hēd), n. A blockhead; a stupid fellow. [Slang.]

Saphena (sa-fē'na), n. [Gr. saphnēs, saphēs, visible.] In anat. one of two subcutaneous veins of the lower limb and foot. Dunglison.

Saphenous (sa-fē'nus), a. Of or pertaining to the saphena; as, the saphenous veins or nerves.

Sapid (sap'id), a. [L. sapidus, from sapio, to taste (hence insipid).] Having the power of affecting the organs of taste; possessing savour or relish; tasteful; savoury.

Thus camels, to make the water sapid, do raise the mud with their feet.

Sir T. Browne.

Sapidity (sa-pi'd-i-ti), n. The quality of being sapid; the power of stimulating or pleasing the palate; tastefulness; savour; relish. 'Ingestible and void of all sapidity.' Sir T. Browne.

Sapidness (sap'id-nes), n. Same as Sapidity.

When the Israelites fancied the sapidness and relish of the flesh-pots, they longed to taste and to return.

Jer. Taylor.

Sapience (sā-pi-ēns), n. [Fr., from L. sapientia, wisdom, from sapio, to taste, to know.] The quality of being sapient; wisdom; sageness; knowledge.

Sapience and love

Immense, and all his Father in him shone. Milton.

Still has gratitude and sapience

To spare the folks that gave him ha'pence. Swift.

Sapient (sā-pi-ēnt), a. [L. sapiens, sapientis, wise, discreet, pp. of sapio, to taste, to know, to be wise.] Wise; sage; discerning. [Now generally ironical, or used of affected wisdom.]

No Solon ever looked so sapient as he does when he is on the point of making a bet, or insidiously plotting a bargain or intrigue.

Dr. Knox.

To shake his sapient head and give

The ill he cannot cure a name. Matt. Arnold.

SYN. Sage, sagacious, knowing, wise, discerning.

Sapiential (sā-pi-ēn'shal), a. Affording wisdom or instructions for wisdom. Bp. Hall; Jer. Taylor. [Rare.]

Sapientially (sā-pi-ēn'shal-li), adv. In a sapiential or wise manner. Baxter.

Sapiently (sā-pi-ēnt-li), adv. In a sapient manner; wisely; sagaciously; sagely.

Sapindaceæ (sap-in-dā'sē-ē), n. pl. A nat. order of polypetalous dicotyledons. It consists of trees or shrubs with erect or climbing stems, inhabitants of most parts of the tropics, more especially of South America and India. The leaves are usually alternate, simple or compound, and the flowers often irregular. In this order, although the leaves, branches, and other organs are often poisonous in various degrees, yet the fruit and seeds are eatable and wholesome. The litchi and longan, favourite fruits in China, are produced by the genus Nephelium. Several other genera bear fruits that are eaten in Japan and Brazil. The typical genus is Sapindus (which see).

Sapindaceous (sap-in-dă'shus), a. Pertaining to plants of the order Sapindaceae.

Sapindus (sa-pin'dus), n. [Contr. from sapo Indicus, or Indian soap. The aril which surrounds the pod of S. Saponaria is used as soap in America.] A genus of plants, nat. order Sapindaceae, containing about forty species found in the tropical parts of the Old and New World. They are trees having exstipulate leaves, with the inflorescence in racemes or terminal panicles. The berries are red and saponaceous, on which account they have been employed for washing cloths of various kinds in the West Indies, the continent of America, Java, and India. The fleshy part of these berries is viscid, and in drying assumes a shining transparent appearance, wherefore they are frequently used as beads for necklaces and rosaries.

Sapindus Saponaria.

When rubbed with water this fleshy part forms a lather like soap, whence their name of soap-berries, often extended to the plant. This is owing to the presence of a principle called saponine (which see). The bark and root have similar properties, and have been employed for the same purpose as well as medicinally in the countries where the plant is indigenous.

Sapium (să'p-um), n. [From Celtic sap, fat, in allusion to the unctuous exudation from the wounded trunk.] A genus of plants, nat. order Euphorbiaceae. S. aucuparium is a native of the woods of Carthage. The juice of this species, as well as that of S. indicum, is highly poisonous.

Sapless (sap'les), a. 1. Destitute of sap; dry; withered. 'A withered vine, that droops his sapless branches to the ground.' Shak. 2. Destitute of healthy vital juice.

Now sapless on the verge of death he stands.

Dryden.

Sapling (sap'ling), n. A young tree full of sap.

What planter will attempt to yoke
A sapling with a falling oak.

Swift

Applied sometimes to a young person.

Peace, tender saplings; thou art made of tears.

Shak.

Sapodilla (sap-ô-dil'la), n. [D. sapodille, Sp. zapotilla, sapodilla, from Mexican zapotil.]

A tree of the genus Achras, the A. Sapota, nat. order Sapotaceae, and found in the West Indies. It is large and straight, and runs to a considerable height without any branches, with a dark gray bark, very much chapped. The fruit resembles a bergamot pear in shape and size. The bark of the sapodilla is used in medicine as an astringent, and the seeds of the fruit (sapodilla plum) are used as a diuretic. The fruit is often called naseberry, and is much prized as an article of diet.

Sapodilla (Achras Sapota).

Saponaceous (sap-ô-nă'shus), a. [From L. sapo, saponis, soap.] Soapy; resembling soap; having the qualities of soap. Saponaceous bodies are compounds of an acid and a base, and are in reality a kind of salt.

Saponacity (sap-ô-nas'i-ti), n. The state of being saponaceous.

Saponaria (sap-ô-nă'ri-a), n. [From L. sapo, saponis, soap.] A genus of annual and perennial herbs, chiefly natives of Europe, nat. order Caryophyllaceae. S. officinalis (common soapwort) is a native of Britain, growing in meadows and shady places. It is a smooth plant with large pink cymose flowers. The whole plant is bitter, and when bruised and agitated in water it raises a lather like soap, which washes greasy spots out of clothes. It has also been used in syphilis.

Saporary (sap'ô-na-ri), a. Saponaceous. 'A soft, saponary substance.' Boyle.

Saponifiable (sa-pôn'i-fi-a-bl), a. Capable of being saponified or converted into soap.

Saponification (sa-pôn'i-fi-kă'shon), n. Conversion into soap; the process in which fatty substances, through combination with an alkali, form soap. In an extended sense the term is applied to the resolution of all ethers and analogous substances into acids and alcohols.

Saponify (sa-pôn'i-fi), v.t. pret. & pp. saponified; ppr. saponifying. [L. sapo, saponis, soap, and facio, to make.] To convert into soap by combination with an alkali.

Saponine, Saponin (sap'on-in), n. ($C_{42}H_{84}O_{18}$). A non-nitrogenous vegetable principle found in the root of Saponaria officinalis, and many other plants. It is white, amorphous, and has a taste first sweet, then astringent, and finally acrid. It is a powerful sterutatory. It is soluble in water, and its solution, even when much diluted, froths on being agitated like a solution of soap.

Saponite (sap'ô-nit), n. A hydrous silicate of magnesia and alumina. It occurs in soft, soapy, amorphous masses, filling veins in serpentine and cavities in trap-rock.

Sapor (să'por), n. [L.] Taste; savour; relish; the power of affecting the organs of taste.

There is some sapor in all ailments.

Sir T. Browne.

Saporific (sap-ô-rif'ik), a. [L. saporificus, L. sapor, saporis, the taste or flavour of a thing, and facio, to make.] Having the power to produce taste; producing taste, flavour, or relish. Johnson.

Saporificence (sap-ô-rif'ik-nes), n. Quality of being saporific.

Saporosity (sap-ô-ros'i-ti), n. The quality of a body by which it excites the sensation of taste.

Saporous (sap'or-us), a. [L. saporosus, tasting well, from sapor, savour.] Having flavour or taste; yielding some kind of taste.

Sapota (sa-pô'ta), n. In bot. the specific name of a tree or plant of the genus Achras, the A. Sapota. See SAPODILLA.

Sapotaceae (sap-ô-lă'sê-ê), n.pl. A nat. order of plants belonging to the polycarpous group of monotepalous exogens. It consists of trees and shrubs which frequently abound in a milky juice, which may be used for alimentary purposes. They have alternate undivided leaves, small solitary or clustered axillary flowers, perfect stamens, opposite to the corolla lobes or double their number, a superior ovary with two or more cells, each containing a solitary ovule, and a baccate or drupaceous fruit. They are chiefly natives of India, Africa, and America. Some of the species produce eatable fruits, as the sapodilla plum, marmalade apple, star apple, medlar of Surinam, &c. The fruit and seeds of some species abound in oil, which is solid like butter, and has a mild pleasant flavour. One of the most important species is the Isonandra Gutta, which produces the gutta percha of commerce. The bark of one species of Achras is astringent and tonic, and has been recommended as a substitute for quinine. See SAPODILLA.

Sapadillo-tree, Sapadillo-tree (sap-a-dil'lo-trê). See SAPODILLA.

Sappan-wood (sapp-an-wud or sa-pan'wud), n. A dyewood produced by a species of Cassalpinia (C. Sappan). It yields a good red colour, which, however, is not easily fixed.

Sappar, Sappare (sapp'par), n. A mineral, called also Kyanite and Disthene. See KYANITE.

Sapper (sap'ér), n. 1. One who saps.—2. Milit. the designation of a private soldier in the Royal Engineers. Formerly the non-commissioned officers and privates of that corps received the general appellation of the Royal Sappers and Miners, which is now no longer used. Their duties consist in building fortifications, in executing field-works, and in performing similar operations under the direction of their superior officers.

Sapphic (saff'fik), a. 1. Pertaining to Sappho, a Grecian poetess; as, Sapphic odes; Sapphic verse.—2. In pros. applied to a kind of verse, said to have been invented by Sappho, consisting of eleven syllables in five feet, of which the first, fourth, and fifth are trochees, the second a spondee, and the third a dactyl. The Sapphic strophe consists of three Sapphic verses followed by an Adonic.

Sardonian (săr-dō'ni-an), a. Sardonic. Bp. Hall.

Sardoniac (săr-don'ik), a. [Fr. sardonique, from L. sardonica herba, the Sardinian herb, an herb said to cause a peculiar twitching of the face when eaten. But the phrase sardonian (or sardonion) gélân, to laugh a bitter laugh, is found in Homer, and has probably nothing to do with Sardinia; the Sardinian herb, indeed, seems to be a mere invention or conjecture to explain a term the origin of which was not known.] 1. Apparently but not really proceeding from gaiety; forced: said of a laugh or smile.

Where strained sardonic smiles are glowing still,
And grief is forced to laugh against her will.

Wotton.

2. Bitterly ironical; sarcastic; derisive and malignant: now the usual meaning. 'The scornful, ferocious, sardonic grin of a bloody ruffian.' Burke.

You were consigned to a master, . . . under whose sardonic glances your scared eyes were afraid to look up. Thackeray.

—Sardoniac smile or laugh, an antiquated medical term applied to a spasmodic twitching of the muscles of the face, giving somewhat the appearance of laughter.

Sardonyx (săr'dō-niks), n. [Gr. sardonyx, from Sardes, a city of Asia Minor, and onyx, a nail: so named, according to Pliny, from the resemblance of its colour to the flesh under the nail.] A precious stone, a beautiful and rare variety of onyx, consisting of alternate layers of sard and white chalcedony. It was formerly much employed for the sculpture of cameos. The name has sometimes been applied to a reddish-yellow or nearly orange variety of chalcedonic quartz resembling carnelian, and also to carnelians whose colours are in alternate bands of red and white.

Sarracenia (sar-a-sê'ni-a), n. The principal genus of Sarraceniaceæ (which see).

Sarraceniaceæ (sar-a-sê'ni-ă'sê-ê), n. pl. [In honour of Dr. Sarrasin, a French physician.] A nat. order of polypetalous exogens which consists of herbaceous perennial plants, inhabiting bogs and swamps in North America. They have radical leaves with a hollow urn-shaped or pitcher-shaped leaf, the point of which is prolonged like a lid. There are three genera (Sarracenia, Darlingtonia, and Heliamphora) belonging to the order, the species of which are inhabitants of northern or tropical America. The pitcher-like leaves of Sarracenia are capable of holding water, and the older leaves are usually full. In some species the water appears to be derived directly from the atmosphere, but the construction of other species, as Sarracenia variolaris, suggests a secretion by the plant as the source. The species are also known by the name of side-saddle flower.

Sarrasine (sar'a-sin), n. Same as Sarasin.

Sarsa (săr'sa), n. Sarsaparilla.

Sarsaparilla (săr'sa-pa-ril'la), n. [Sp. zarzaparrilla, the plant Smilax aspera, from Sp. zarza, a bramble, and parilla, dim. of parra, a vine; as others say from Parillo, a Spanish physician, who first made use of it as a medicine.] The rhizome of several plants of the genus Smilax (which see). S. medica supplies the sarza of Vera Cruz. S.

Sarsaparilla (Smilax medica).

siphilitica, or S. papyracea, yields the Lisbon or Brazilian sort. S. officinalis belongs to Central America, although it yields the kind known as Jamaica sarsaparilla, and Hemidesmus indicus (an asclepiadaceous climber), the East Indian sort. Sarsaparilla is valued in medicine on account of its mucilaginous and demulcent qualities. The kind now generally preferred is the reddish fibrous root, known in the market under the name of Jamaica or red sarsaparilla. This root is used as a powerful and valuable alterative medicine in many disorders of debility.

Sarse (săr's), n. [Fr. sas, a sieve, O.Fr. saas, Sp. sedaza, Neapolitan setaccio, from L.L. setaceum, something made of bristles, from L. seta, a bristle. Brachet.] A fine sieve: usually written Searse or Searse.

A poetical composition holding up vice or folly to reprobation, and as a distinctive species of literary production first employed by ancient Roman writers; an invective poem.— 2. Any literary production in which persons, manners, or actions are attacked or denounced with irony, sarcasm, or similar weapons; a trenchant or cutting exposure of men or manners; keenness and severity of remark; trenchant invective; as, to be much given to satire; to write a satire on modern society.

Satire has always shone among the rest,
And is the boldest way, if not the best,
To tell men freely of their foulest faults,
To laugh at their vain deeds and vainer thoughts.

Dryden.

Satire is a valuable element of history—in politics and ethics it is the most permanent protest of good against evil and of genius against stupidity.

Lord Houghton.

2. Severe criticism or denunciation.

The owls, bats, and several other birds of night, were one day got together in a thick shade, where they abused their neighbours in a very sociable manner. Their satire at last fell upon the sun, whom they all agreed to be very troublesome, impertinent, and inquisitive. Addison.

SYN. Sarcasm, irony, ridicule, lampoon, pasquinade, burlesque, wit, humour.

Satiric, Satirical (sa-ti'rik, sa-ti'rik-al), a. [L. satiricus, Fr. satirique. See SATIRE.] 1. Belonging to satire; conveying or containing satire; as, a satirical work. 'A satiric style.' Roscommon.

He gave the little fool he had
To build a house for fools and mad;
To show by one satiric touch
No nation wanted it so much.

Swift.

2. Fond of indulging in satire; given to satire; severe in language.

The satirical rogue here says that old men have grey beards. Shak.

Satirist (sat'ir-ist), n. One who satirizes; specifically, one who writes satire.

Wycherley, in his writings, is the sharpest satirist of his time. Granville.

Satirize (sat'ir-iz), *v. t. pret. & pp. satirized; ppr. satirizing. [Fr. satiriser.] To assail with satire; to make the object of satire; to censure with keenness or sarcastic wit.*

It is as hard to satirize well a man of distinguished vices, as to praise well a man of distinguished virtues.

Swift.

Satisfaction (sat-is-fak'shon), n. [Fr., from L. satisfactio. See SATISFY.] 1. The act of satisfying, or state of being satisfied; gratification of appetite or desire; contentment in possession and enjoyment; repose of mind resulting from compliance with what it demands.

Run over the circle of the earthly pleasures, and had not God procured a man a solid pleasure from his own actions, he would be forced to complain that pleasure was not satisfaction. South.

2. Settlement of a claim due, a demand, &c.; payment; indemnification.

You know since Pentecost the sum is due,
Therefore make present satisfaction. Shak.

3. That which satisfies or gratifies; compensation; atonement; reparation.

Die he or justice must; unless for him
Some other able, and as willing, pay
The rigid satisfaction, death for death. Milton.

4. The opportunity of satisfying one's honour by a duel; a hostile meeting conceded on the challenge or cartel of an aggrieved party; used adjectively in extract.

A case of satisfaction pistols, with the satisfactory accompaniments of powder, ball, and caps, were hired from a manufacturer. Dickens.

—Contentment, Satisfaction. See under CONTENTMENT.—SYN. Contentment, content, gratification, pleasure, recompense, compensation, amends, remuneration, indemnification, atonement.

Satisfactive (sat-is-fak'tiv), a. Giving satisfaction. 'A final and satisfactive discernment of faith.' Sir T. Browne. [Rare.]

Satisfactorily (sat-is-fak'to-ri-ly), adv. In a satisfactory manner; so as to give satisfaction, content, conviction, or the like. 'To answer him satisfactorily unto all his demands.' Sir K. Digby.

Satisfactoriness (sat-is-fak'to-ri-ness), n. The state or quality of being satisfactory; the power of satisfying or giving content; as, the satisfactoriness of pleasure or enjoyment.

The incompleteness of the seraphic lover's happiness in his fruitions, proceeds not from their want of satisfactoriness, but his want of an entire possession of them. Boyle.

Satisfactory (sat-is-fak'to-ri), a. [Fr. satisfactoire.] 1. Giving or producing satisfaction; yielding content; particularly, relieving the mind from doubt or uncertainty, and enabling it to rest with confidence; as, to give a satisfactory account of any remarkable transaction.— 2. Making amends, indemnification, or recompense; causing to cease from claims and to rest content; atoning.

A most wise and sufficient means of salvation by the satisfactory and meritorious death and obedience of the incarnate Son of God, Jesus Christ.

Bp. Sanderson.

Satisfiable (sat-is-fi'a-bl), a. Capable of being satisfied.

Satisfier (sat'is-fi-ér), n. A person or thing that gives satisfaction.

Satisfy (sat'is-fi), *v. t. pret. & pp. satisfied; ppr. satisfying. [Fr. satisfaire; L. satisfacio—satis, enough, and facio, to make.] 1. To gratify fully the wants, wishes, or desires of; to supply to the full extent with what is wished for; to make content; as, to satisfy hunger or thirst; to satisfy a hungry man. 'Satisfy our eyes.' *Shak.

The sports of children satisfy the child. Goldsmith.

2. To comply with the rightful demands of; to give what is due to; to answer or discharge, as a claim, debt, legal demand, or the like; to pay; to liquidate; to requite.

A grave question . . . arose, whether the money . . . should be paid directly to the discontented chiefs or should be employed to satisfy the claims which Argyle had against them. Macaulay.

3. To fulfil the conditions of; to answer; as, an algebraical equation is said to be satisfied when, after the substitution of any expressions for the unknown quantities which enter it, the two members are equal.— 4. To free from doubt, suspense, or uncertainty; to give full assurance to; to set at rest the mind of; to convince; as, to satisfy one's self by inquiry.

I will be satisfied; let me see the writing. Shak.

SYN. To content, please, gratify, satiate, sate, recompense, compensate, remunerate, indemnify.

Satisfy (sat'is-fi), v. i. 1. To give satisfaction or content; as, earthly good never satisfies. 2. To make payment; to atone.

Satisfying (sat'is-fi-ing), p. & a. Giving satisfaction or content; setting doubts at rest.

The standing evidences of the truth of the gospel are in themselves most firm, solid, and satisfying. Atterbury.

Satisfyingly (sat'is-fi-ing-ly), adv. In a manner tending to satisfy.

Sative (sá'tiv), a. [L. sativus, from sero, satum, to sow.] Sown, as in a garden. 'Preferring the domestic or sative for the fuller growth' Evelyn.

Satrap (sá'trap), n. [Gr. satrapês; borrowed from the Persian.] 1. A governor of a province under the ancient Persian monarchy. 2. A prince; a petty despot. 'Obsequious tribes of satraps, princes.' Shenstone.

Satrapal (sá'trap-al), a. Pertaining to a satrap or a satrapy.

Satrapess (sá'trap-es), n. A female satrap.

Satrapical (sat-rap'ik-al), a. Satrapal.

Satrapy (sá'trap-i), n. The government or jurisdiction of a satrap; a principality; a principedom.

The angels themselves are distinguished and quartered into their celestial principedoms and satrapies. Milton.

Saturable (sat'ü-ra-bl), a. [See SATURATE.] Admitting of being saturated; capable of saturation.

Saturant (sat'ü-rant), a. [L. saturans, saturans, ppr. of saturio. See SATURATE.] Saturating; impregnating to the full.

Saturate (sat'ü-rant), n. In med. a substance which neutralizes the acid in the stomach.

Saturate (sat'ü-rät), *v. t. pret. & pp. saturated; ppr. saturating. [L. saturio, saturatum, from satur, filled (whence sature); from root of satis, enough, satio, to feed to the full. See SATIS.] 1. To cause to become completely penetrated, impregnated, or soaked; to fill fully; to imbue thoroughly; to soak; as, to saturate a cloth with moisture; saturated with ancient learning. 'Adulteries that saturate soul with body.' *Tennyson.

Imnumerable flocks and herds covered that vast expanse of emerald meadow, saturated with the moisture of the Atlantic. Macaulay.

2. In chem. to impregnate or unite with till no more can be received; thus, an acid saturates an alkali, and an alkali saturates an acid, when the solvent can contain no more of the dissolving body.

Saturate (sat'ü-rät), a. Being full; saturated. 'Though soaked and saturate, out and out.' Tennyson.

The lark is gay

That dries its feathers, saturate with dew. Couper.

Saturation (sat'ü-rä'shon), n. The act of saturating or filling or supplying to fullness, or the state of being so saturated; complete penetration or impregnation; specifically, in chem. the union, combination, or impregnation of one body with another in such definite proportions as that they neutralize each other, or till the receiving body can contain no more; solution continued till the solvent can contain no more. The saturation of an alkali by an acid is by one sort of affinity; the saturation of water by salt is by another sort of affinity, called solution. A fluid which holds in solution as much of any substance as it can dissolve is said to be saturated with it, but saturation with one substance does not deprive the fluid of its power of acting on and dissolving some other bodies; and in many cases it increases this power. For example, water saturated with salt will dissolve sugar.

Saturday (sat'ér-dä), n. [A. Sax. Soeterdæg, Sæterdæg—Sæter, Sætern, for Sætern, and dæg, a day—the day presided over by the planet Saturn; D. Zaterdag; L. dies Saturni.] The seventh or last day of the week; the day of the Jewish Sabbath.

Satureia (sat'ü-rë'i-a), n. [L. savory.] A genus of herbs and undershrubs commonly called Savory, and used in cookery as a seasoning, particularly the summer savory (S. hortensis), an annual plant cultivated in kitchen-gardens. The species are mostly natives of Europe, and belong to the nat. order Labiata. They have narrow, opposite, pale-green leaves, and small pale-lilac axillary flowers.

Saturity† (sa-tü'ri-ti), n. [L. saturitas. See SATURATE.] Fullness or excess of supply; the state of being saturated; repletion.

In all things for man's use there is not only a mere necessity given of God, but also a satiety permitted; not saturity. Granger.

Saturn (sat'érn), n. [L. Saturnus, connected with sero, satum, to sow.] 1. An ancient Italian deity, popularly believed to have made his first appearance in Italy in the reign of Janus, instructing the people in agriculture, gardening, &c., thus elevating them from barbarism to social order and civilization. He was consequently elected to share the government with Janus, and the country was called Saturnia after him. His reign came afterwards to be sung by the poets as 'the golden age.' He was often identified with the Kronos of the Greeks. His temple was the state treasury. Ops was his wife. His festivals, Saturnalia, corresponded to the Greek Kronia.—2. One of the planets of the solar system, less in magnitude than Jupiter, but more remote from the sun. Its mean diameter is about 70,000 miles, its mean distance from the sun somewhat more than 872,000,000 miles, and its year or periodical revolution round the sun nearly twenty-nine years and a half. Saturn is attended by eight satellites, and surrounded by a system of flat rings, which are now supposed to be an immense multitude of small satellites, mixed probably with vaporous matter.—3. In old chem. an appellation given to lead.—4. In her. the black colour in blazoning the arms of sovereign princes.

Saturnalia (sat-ér-ná-li-a), n. pl. [L.] 1. In Rom. antiq. the festival of Saturn, celebrated in December as a period of unrestrained license and merriment for all classes, extending even to the slaves. Hence—2. Any period of noisy license and revelry, especially among the lower orders; unconstrained, licentious revelling.

Saturnalian (sat-ér-ná-li-an), a. [From L. saturnalia, feasts of Saturn.] 1. Pertaining to the festivals celebrated in honour of Saturn, in which men indulged in riot without restraint. Hence—2. Loose; dissolute; sportive.

In order to make this saturnalian amusement general in the family you sent it down stairs. Burke.

Saturnia (sa-tér-ni-a), n. A genus of moths containing many large species with clear spaces in the wing. One or two of the Indian species produce a useful though coarse silk, such as the Arrindy and Tusseh silkworm, much employed in India.

Saturnian (sa-tér-ni-an), a. 1. Pertaining to the god Saturn, whose age or reign, from the mildness and wisdom of his government, was called 'the golden age'; hence golden; happy; distinguished for purity, integrity, and simplicity. 'Th' Augustus, born to bring Saturnian times.' Pope.—2. Leaden; dull, Saturn being an old name for lead.

Then rose the seed of Chaos and of Night
To blot out order and extinguish light,
Of dull and vernal a new world to mould,
And bring Saturnian days of lead and gold. Pope.

—Saturnian verse, an ancient and peculiar metre used by the Romans, consisting of three iambs and a syllable over, followed by three trochees, as exemplified happily by Macaulay in the nursery rhyme:—

Thé queen | wás in | hër pàr | lor || èating | bréad
And | hönëy.

Saturnine (sat-ér-nin), a. 1. Supposed to be under the influence of the planet Saturn, which tended to make people morose. Hence—2. Morose; dull; heavy; grave; not readily susceptible of excitement; phlegmatic; as, a saturnine person or temper.

My conversation is slow and dull, my humour saturnine and reserved. Dryden.

3. In old chem. pertaining to lead; as, saturnine compounds.

Sauria (sə'ri-a), n. pl. [From Gr. sauros, a lizard.] The term by which the great order of lizards is sometimes designated. The animal forms more strictly included under it are those comprised under the genus Lacerta of Linnaeus; but in the large and now generally received acceptation of the term Saurians, not only the existing lizards, crocodiles, monitors, iguanas, chameleons, &c., are included, but also those monstrous fossil reptiles whose remains excite our wonder, as the ichthyosaurus, plesiosaurus, deinosaurus, iguanodon, pterodactyle, &c. The saurians are covered with scales, and have four legs. The mouth is always armed with teeth, and the toes are generally furnished with claws. They have all a tail more or less long, and generally very thick at the base. The fossil species, the most gigantic and singular members of the order, occur most abundantly in the oolitic strata. Some of them were exclusively marine, others amphibious, others terrestrial, and others were adapted for flying, as the pterodactyles.

Saurian (sə'ri-an), a. [Gr. sauros, a lizard.] Pertaining to the Sauria or lizards; designating an order of reptiles.

Saurian (sə'ri-an), n. One of the order Sauria; a lizard or lizard-like animal.

Saurillus (sə'ril-lus), n. [Dim. of Gr. sauros, a lizard.] An extinct genus of reptiles belonging to the lizard order. Their fossil remains occur in upper oolitic rocks.

Saurless (sə'lee), n. Savourless; insipid; tasteless. [Scotch.]

Sauobatrachia (sə'rō-ba-trā'ki-a), n. pl. [Gr. sauros, a lizard, and batrachos, a frog.] A name sometimes applied to the order of the tailed amphibians, otherwise called Urodela, and by Owen Ichthyomorphia. See URODELA.

Saurocephalus (sə'rō-sef'al-us), n. [Gr. sauros, a lizard, and kephale, a head.] A genus of fossil fishes of the cycloid order, found in the chalk formation.

Saurodon (sə'rō-don), n. [Gr. sauros, a lizard, and odon, odorous, a tooth.] A genus of fossil fishes from the chalk series of England and America.

Sauroid (sə'roid), a. Resembling lizards; as, sauroid fish.

Sauroid (sə'roid), n. [Gr. sauros, a lizard, and eidos, form.] A member of a group of large fishes, some existing and some fossil. The fossil sauroids are found in great abundance in the carboniferous and secondary formations. They combined in their structure certain characters of reptiles, and had teeth resembling those of crocodiles. The Sauroids (fossil).

1. Pygopterus (restored). 2. Tooth of do. (enlarged). 3. Jaw with teeth of Belonostomus cinctus. 4. Tooth of B. cinctus (enlarged).

existing sauroid fishes consist of several species, the best known being the bony pikes and sturgeons constituting respectively the genera Lepidosteus and Acipenser. The members of another genus (Polypterus) inhabit the Nile, Senegal, and other African rivers, and are remarkable for the peculiar structure of the dorsal fin, which is broken up into a number of separate portions.

Sauroidichnite (sə'roid-ik-nit), n. The foot-print of a saurian. See ICHNITE.

Saurophagus (sə-rof'a-gus), n. [Gr. sauros, a lizard, and phagō, to eat.] A genus of birds belonging to the family of the butcher-birds.

Sauropsida (sə-rof'si-da), n. pl. [Gr. sauros, a lizard, opsis, appearance, and eidos, resemblance.] Professor Huxley's name for the second of his three primary sections of vertebrates, comprising birds and reptiles. The animals of this section are characterized by the absence of gills, by having the skull jointed to the vertebral column by a single occipital condyle, the lower jaw composed of several pieces, and united to the skull by means of a special (quadrate) bone, and by possessing nucleated red blood corpuscles, as well as by certain embryonic characters.

Sauropserygia (sə'rop-tēr-i'gi-a), n. pl. [Gr. sauros, a lizard, and pteryx, pterygos, a wing, a fin.] An extinct order of reptiles corresponding to Huxley's order Plesiosauria, and forming one of the thirteen orders into which Owen arranges all the Reptilia. There are ten genera, extending through all the strata from the trias to the chalk inclusive. The genus Plesiosaurus may be regarded as the type. See PLESIOSAURUS.

Saururaceæ (sə-rō-rā'sē-ē), n. pl. [Gr. sauros, a lizard, and oura, a tail, in allusion to the appearance of the flower-spike.] A nat. order of plants belonging to the achlamydeous group of incomplete exogens. It consists of a few genera which are aquatic or marshy herbs or herbaceous plants, found in North America, China, the north of India, and the Cape of Good Hope. They are simple or little branched herbs, with alternate, stipulate, entire leaves, and small flowers in dense terminal spikes or racemes.

Saururus (sə-rō-rē), n. pl. [Gr. sauros, a lizard, and oura, a tail.] An extinct order of birds, including only a single member, the Archæopteryx macrura, of which only a single fragmentary specimen has been discovered in the upper oolite (lithographic slates) of Solenhofen. It seems to have been as large as a rook. It differs from all known birds in having two free claws belonging to the wing, a lizard-like tail longer than the body (whence the name of the order), and no ploughshare bone. The metacarpal bones are not ankylized as they are in all other known birds living and extinct.

Saury-pike (sə'ri-pik), n. A fish of the genus Scomberoxys, family Scomberosidae, and order Pharyngognathi, having a greatly elongated body covered with minute scales. The jaws are prolonged into a long sharp beak. One species (S. saurus), about 15 inches long, occurs plentifully on the British coasts, frequenting firths in shoals so dense that it may be taken in palfuls. In order to escape the pursuit of the porpoise and large fishes it often leaps out of the water or skims rapidly along the surface, whence it has obtained the name of skipper. The flesh is palatable.

Sausage (sə'saj), n. [Old spellings sauicidge, sauisage, O. Fr. sauissise, Fr. sauissee; from L.L. salsus, sauce (which see).] An article of food, consisting of chopped or minced meat, as pork, beef, or veal, seasoned with sage, pepper, salt, &c., and stuffed into properly cleaned entrails of the ox, sheep, or pig, tied at short intervals with a string. When sausages are made on an extensive scale the meat is minced and stuffed into the intestines by machinery.

Sausage-roll (sə'saj-rōl), n. Meat minced and seasoned as for sausages, enveloped in a roll of flour paste, and cooked.

Sausefeme, † n. [L. salsum, salt, and phlegma, phlegm.] An eruption of red spots or scabs on the face. Chaucer.

Sausefemeled, † pp. Having red spots or scabs on the face.

Saussurea (sə-su'rē-a), n. [In honour of Horace Benjamin de Saussure, a Swiss naturalist.] A genus of plants, nat. order Compositæ. S. alpina is a British species, which grows on moist alpine rocks, and is frequent on the Highland mountains of Scotland.

Saussurite (sə'sūr-it), n. A mineral so named from Saussure, the discoverer, of a white, gray, or green colour, found at the foot of Mount Rosa. It is an impure Labrador-felspar, and is known in the Swiss Alps as jade.

She loved money; for she was saving, and applied her fortune to pay John's clamorous debts. Arbutnot.

3. Bringing back in returns or receipts the principal or sum employed or expended; incurring no loss, though not gainful; as, the ship has made a saving voyage.

Slivio, finding his application unsuccessful, was resolved to make a saving bargain; and since he could not get the widow's estate, to recover what he had laid out of his own. Addison.

4. Reserving, as some title or right.

Ordinances may be cited of every reign from St. Louis to Francis I. regulating the jurisdiction of Seneschals and Baillis and giving them various powers, but always directing by saving clauses that the jurisdiction of the Barons who had right of Haute Justice should not be interfered with. Brougham.

Saving (sāv'ing), n. 1. Something kept from being expended or lost; something hoarded up; that which is saved; generally in plural. 'Hoard all savings to the uttermost.' Tennyson.—2. Exception; reservation.

Content not with those that are too strong for us, but still with a saving to honesty. Sir R. L'Estrange.

Saving (sāv'ing), prep. 1. With exception; in favour of; excepting.

Such laws cannot be abrogated saving only by whom they were made. Hooker.

2. Without disrespect to. See under REVERENCE. 'Saving your reverence.' Shak.

Savingly (sāv'ing-lī), adv. 1. In a saving manner; with frugality or parsimony.—2. So as to be finally saved from eternal death; as, savingly converted.

Savingness (sāv'ing-nes), n. 1. The quality of being saving; frugality; parsimony; caution not to expend money without necessity or use.—2. Tendency to promote safety or eternal salvation. 'The safety and savingness which it promiseteth.' Brevint.

Savings-bank (sāv'ingz-bangk), n. An institution devised for receiving and securely investing the savings of industry, and for their accumulation at compound interest, under provisions for their repayment on demand or at short notice, managed by persons having no interest in the profits of the business. The National Security Savings-banks and the Post-office Savings-banks are the great British institutions of this kind. Acts for the regulation of the former were passed in 1817, empowering the managers to pay the deposits into the Bank of England to the credit-account of the commissioners for the reduction of the national debt, a fixed rate of interest being given thereupon. The national post-office savings-bank scheme came into operation in 1861. The old savings-banks and the post-office savings-banks have continued to work harmoniously together, and each system appears to offer special advantages on certain points. Penny savings-banks, military savings-banks, and savings-banks for seamen have been established as auxiliaries of the general system, for the purpose of meeting the special needs of classes for which the ordinary savings-banks did not hold out adequate inducements or facilities.

Saviour (sāv'yér), n. [O. Fr. salvor (Mod. Fr. sauveur), from L.L. salvator, from L. salvus, safe.] 1. One who saves, preserves, or delivers from destruction or danger. 2. Ki. xiii. 5; Is. xix. 20.—2. Jesus Christ, the Redeemer, who has opened the way to everlasting salvation by his obedience and death, and who is therefore called the Saviour by way of distinction.

Lightly from his grassy couch up rose
Our Saviour, and found all was but a dream. Milton.

Saviouress (sāv'yér-es), n. A female saviour. [Rare.]

One says to the blessed Virgin, O Saviouress, save me. Bp. Hall.

Savonette (sav-o-net'), n. [Fr. dim. of savon, soap.] A wash-ball for use at the toilet, composed of soap of fine quality, perfumed at will, and generally with the addition of some powdered starch or farina, and sometimes sand.

Savor (sāv'or), n. Same as Savour.

Savourous, a. Savoury; sweet; pleasant. Roman of the Rose.

Savory (sāv'ér-i), n. [Fr. savorie, It. satoreja, L. satureia, savory.] A plant of the genus Satureia (which see).

Savour (sāv'ér), n. [O. Fr. savor, Mod. Fr. savor; L. sapor, from sapio, to taste.] 1. Smell; odour. 'I smell sweet savours.' Shak. 'A savour that may strike the duldest nostril.' Shak. 'The uncleanly savours of a slaughter-house.' Shak.—2. Flavour; taste; relish; power or quality that affects the palate; as, food with a pleasant savour. 'If the salt hath lost his savour.' Mat. v. 13.—

3. Characteristic property; distinctive flavour, quality, or the like. 'The savour of death from all things there that live.' Milton. 'The savour of heaven perpetually upon my spirit.' Baxter.—4. Character; reputation. Ex. v. 21.—5. Sense of smell; power to scent or perceive. [Rare.]—6. † Pleasure; delight.

Savour (sāv'ér), v.t. 1. To have a particular smell or taste; to have a flavour.

What is loathsome to the young Savours well to thee and me. Tennyson.

2. To be of a particular nature; to partake of the quality, nature, or appearance of something else; to smack; to betoken; followed by of; as, the answers savour of a humble spirit; or they savour of pride.

This savours not much of distraction. Shak.
I have rejected every thing that savours of party. Addison.

Savour (sāv'ér), v.t. 1. To like; to taste or smell with pleasure; to relish; to take pleasure in; to enjoy. 'Filth savour but themselves.' Shak.

Thou savour'st not the things that be of God, but those that be of men. Mat. xvi. 23.

2. † To perceive by the taste or smell; hence, to taste intellectually; to perceive; to discern; to note. 'Were it not that in your writings I savour a spirit so very distant from my disposition, &c.' Heylin.—3. To indicate the presence of; to have the flavour or quality of.

Willful barrenness,
That cuts us off from hope; and savours only Rancour and pride, impatience and despite. Milton.

Savourily (sāv'ér-i-lī), adv. 1. In a savoury manner; with a pleasing relish. 'When silly plays so savourily go down.' Dryden.—2. † With gusto or appetite. 'The collation he fell to very savourily.' Sir R. L'Estrange.

Savouriness (sāv'ér-i-nes), n. The condition or quality of being savoury; pleasing taste or smell; as, the savouriness of a pineapple or a peach. 'The savouriness of meat.' Jer. Taylor.

Savourless (sāv'ér-les), a. Destitute of savour; insipid.

Savoury (sāv'ér-lī), a. Well-seasoned; of good taste; savoury.

Savourily (sāv'ér-lī), adv. With a pleasing relish. 'Then his food doth taste savourily.' Barrow.

Savourous (sāv'ér-us), a. Sweet; pleasant. Roman of the Rose.

Savoury (sāv'ér-i), a. Having savour or relish; pleasing to the organs of smell or taste, especially the latter; palatable; hence, agreeable in general; as, a savoury odour; savoury meat. Gen. xxvii. 4.

One of Cromwell's chief difficulties was to restrain his musketeers and dragoons from invading by main force the pulpits of ministers whose discourses, to use the language of that time, were not savoury. Macaulay.

Savoury (sāv'ér-i), n. Same as Savoury.

Savoy (sav'oi), n. A variety of the common cabbage (Brassica oleracea bullata major), much cultivated for winter use.

Savoyard (sav-vo'i-ard), n. A native or inhabitant of Savoy.

Saw (sā), pret. of see.

Saw (sā), n. [A. Sax. sage, a saw; common to the Teutonic languages: Dan. sav, Icel. sǫg, D. zaag, G. säge.] A cutting instrument consisting of a blade, band, or disc of thin iron or steel, with a dentated or toothed edge. Saws are employed to cut wood, stone, ivory, and other solid substances, and are either reciprocating or circular. The best saws are of tempered steel, ground bright, and smooth. They are of various forms and sizes, varying from the minute surgical or dental tool to the large instrument used in saw-mills, and may be divided into hand-tools and machine-tools. The hand tools used by carpenters and other artificers in wood are the most numerous. Among the most common straight saws in general use are the following:—The cross-cut saw, for cutting logs transversely, and wrought by two persons, one at each end. The pit-saw, a long blade of steel with large teeth and a transverse handle at each end; it is used in saw-pits for sawing logs into planks or scantlings, and is wrought by two persons. The frame-saw, consisting of a blade from 5 to 7 feet long, stretched tightly in a frame of wood. It is used in a similar manner to the pit-saw. The ripping-saw, half-ripper, hand-saw, and panel-saw are saws for the use of one person, the blades tapering in length from the handle. Tenon-saws, sash-saws, dove-tail saws, &c., are

Fäte, fär, fat, fäll; më, met, hër; pine, pin; nôte, not, möve; tübe, tub, bull;

oil, pound; ü, Sc. abune; ý, Sc. fey.

saws made of very thin blades of steel stiffened with stout pieces of brass, iron, or steel fixed on their back edges. They are used for forming the shoulders of tenons, dove-tail joints, &c., and for many other purposes for which a neat clean cut is required. Compass and key-hole saws are long narrow saws, tapering from about 1 inch to $\frac{1}{2}$ inch in width, and used for making curved cuts. Small frame-saws and bowsaws, in which very thin narrow blades are tightly stretched, are occasionally used for cutting both wood and metal. Machine saws are comprehended under three different classes—circular, reciprocating, and band-saws. The circular saw is a disc of steel with saw teeth upon its periphery. It is made to revolve with great rapidity and force, while the log is pushed forward against it by means of a travelling platform. The reciprocating saw works like a two-handled hand-saw, but it is fixed and the wood carried forward against its teeth. The band-saw or ribbon-saw consists of a thin endless saw placed like a belt over two wheels, and strained on them. The ribbon passes down through a flat sawing-table, upon which the material to be cut is laid. Saws for cutting stone are without teeth.

Saw (sə), n. [A. Sax. sagu, a saying, a saw, from root of to say. See SAY.] 1. A saying; proverb; maxim. 'Full of wise saws.' Shak. 'No sabbath-drawler of old saws.' Tennyson.—2. † A decree. Spenser.—Aphorism, Axiom, Maxim, Apophthegm, Adage, Proverb, Byword, Saw. See under APHORISM. Saw (sə), v.t. pret. sawed; pp. sawed or sawn. [From the noun.] 1. To cut with a saw; to separate with a saw; as, to saw timber or marble.—2. To form by cutting with a saw; as, to saw boards or planks; that is, to saw timber into boards or planks.—3. To move through, as in the act of sawing.

Do not saw the air too much with your hand, thus; but use all gently. Shak.

Saw (sə), v.i. 1. To use a saw; to practise sawing; as, a man saws well.—2. To cut with a saw; as, the mill saws fast or well.—3. To be cut with a saw; as, the timber saws smoothly.

Saw (sə), n. Salve. [Scotch.]

Sawarra-nut (sə-wär'ra-nut), n. Same as Saouari.

Sawder (sə'dér), n. [Corrupted from Solder.] Flattery; blarney. [Slang.] See under SOFT. Saw-dust (sə'dust), n. Dust or small fragments of wood, stone, or other material, produced by the attrition of a saw.

Sawer (sə'ér), n. One that saws; a Sawyer. Sawf-box† (sə'f'box), n. A box of salve. 'A sawf-box for a wounded conscience.' Cowley.

Saw-file (sə'fil), n. A file adapted for sharpening saws. It is triangular in section for hand-saws, and flat for mill-saws. E. H. Knight.

Saw-fish (sə'fish), n. An Elasmobranchiate fish of the genus Pristis (P. antiquorum), nearly related on the one hand to the sharks, and on the other to the rays. It attains a length of from 12 to 18 feet, has a long beak or snout, with spines growing like teeth on both edges, armed with which it is very destructive to shoals of small fishes, and is said to attack and inflict severe and even mortal injuries on the large cetaceans or whales. The saw-fish shown in the cut belongs to the genus Pristiphorus, in which the teeth are not implanted in the bone of the snout, but merely attached to the skin.

Tentacled Saw-fish (Pristiphorus cirratus).

Saw-fly (sə'fi), n. One of a group of insects belonging to the order Hymenoptera, and distinguished by the peculiar conformation of the ovipositor of the females, which is composed of two broad plates, with serrated or toothed edges, by means of which they incise the stems and leaves of plants, and deposit their eggs in the slits thus formed. The turnip-fly (Athalia centifolia) and the gooseberry-fly (Nematus grossulariae) are examples.

Saw-frame (sə'frām), n. The frame in which a saw is set; a saw-sash.

Saw-gate (sə'gāt), n. The rectangular frame in which a mill-saw or gang of mill-saws is stretched; a saw-sash.

Saw-gin (sə'jin), n. A machine used to divest cotton of its husk and other superfluous parts. See COTTON-GIN.

Saw-mandrel (sə'man-drel), n. A contrivance for holding a saw in a lathe.

Saw-mill (sə'mil), n. A mill for sawing timber, and driven by water or steam. The saws used are of two distinct kinds, the circular and the reciprocating. See under SAW.

Sawn (sən), pp. of saw.

Sawney, Sawny (sə'ni), n. A nickname for a Scotchman, from Saidy, a corruption of Alexander.

Saw-pit (sə'pit), n. A pit over which timber is sawed by two men, one standing below the timber and the other above.

Saw-sash (sə'sash), n. Same as Saw-gate.

Saw-set (sə'set), n. An instrument used to wrest or turn the teeth of saws alternately to the right and left so that they may make a kerf somewhat wider than the thickness of the blade. Called also Saw-wrest.

Saw-toothed (sə'tótht), a. Having teeth like a saw; serrated.

Sawtry† (sə'tri), n. A psalter. Dryden.

Saw-whet, Saw-whetter (sə'whet, sə'whet-ér), n. In the United States, the popular name for the Acadian owl (Strix acadica) of Audubon.

Saw-wort (sə'wért), n. Serratula, a genus of plants of the nat. order Composite. It is so named from its serrated leaves. Common saw-wort (S. tinctoria) is a tall perennial plant with heads of purple flowers indigenous to England, growing in woods and in pasture grounds. It is used for dyeing cloth yellow, and is considered useful against piles.

Saw-wrest (sə'rest), n. Same as Saw-set.

Sawyer (sə'yér), n. [In regard to the form of this word comp. lawyer, bouyer.] 1. One whose occupation is to saw timber into planks or boards, or to saw wood for fuel. 2. In the United States, a tree which, being undermined by a current of water, and falling into the stream, is swept along with its branches above water, which are continually raised and depressed by the force of the current, from which circumstance the name is derived. The sawyers in the Missouri and Mississippi render the navigation dangerous, and frequently sink boats which run against them.

Sax† (saks), n. [A. Sax. seax.] A knife; a sword; a dagger.

Saxatile (səks'sa-til), a. [L. saxatilis, from saxum, a rock.] Pertaining to rocks; living among rocks.

Sax-horn (saks'hörn), n. [After M. Sax, of Paris, the inventor. One of several brass wind-instruments with a wide mouthpiece and three, four, or five cylinders, much employed in military bands. The tone is round, pure, and full. These horns comprise the very high small sax-horn, the soprano, the alto, the tenor, baritone, bass, and double bass. Called also Sax-cornet.

Saxicava (səks-si-kä'va), n. [L. saxum, a rock, and cavo, to hollow out, to excavate.] A genus of lamellibranchiate molluscs, family Saxicavidae or Gastrochenidae, often found in the hollows of rocks, in cavities on the back of oysters, and among the roots of sea-weed, &c. On different parts of the coast of England masses of rock are found pierced with innumerable small holes, which form the entrances to the habitations of these animals.

Saxicavidae (səks-si-kä'vi-dē), n. pl. A family of perforating bivalve molluscs, named from the genus Saxicava.

Saxicavous (səks-si-kä'vus), a. [L. saxum, a rock, and cavo, to hollow out.] In zool. a term applied to molluscs which make holes in the rocks, either by boring them or by dissolving the rock by means of some acid which they secrete. See SAXICAVA.

Saxicola (səks-sik'ó-la), n. [L. saxum, rock, colo, to inhabit.] A genus of birds, the chats.

Saxicolous (səks-sik'ó-lus), a. In bot. growing on rocks.

Saxifraga (səks-sif-ra-ga), n. A genus of plants, the type of the nat. order Saxifragaceæ. See SAXIFRAGE.

Saxifragaceæ (səks-sif-ra-gä'sē-sē), n. pl. A nat. order of plants, belonging to the apocarpous group of polypetalous exogens. It consists of shrubs and herbaceous plants, with simple alternate leaves, without stipules, regular, often handsome flowers with perigynous or epigynous petals, definite stamens, free or connate carpels, and albuminous seeds. The species inhabit the mountainous districts of Europe and the northern parts of the world; the whole order is more or less astringent. The root of Heuchera americana is a powerful astringent, and called in North America alum-root.

Saxifragaceous (səks-sif-ra-gä'shus), a. Belonging to the Saxifragaceæ.

Saxifragant (səks-sif-ra-gant), a. Breaking or destroying stones; saxifragous; lithotritic. [Rare.]

Saxifragant (səks-sif-ra-gant), n. That which breaks or destroys stones. [Rare.]

Saxifrage (səks'si-fräj), n. [L. saxifraga—saxum, a stone, and frango, to break. The name was originally given to a plant supposed to be beneficial in removing stone in the bladder; but the saxifrages seem to have got the name rather from growing among rocks.] A popular name of various plants, the saxifrages proper belonging to the Chinese Saxifrage (Saxifraga sarmentosa). ss, Sarmenta.

genus Saxifraga of the nat. order Saxifragaceæ. The species are mostly inhabitants of alpine and subalpine regions of the colder and temperate parts of the northern zone. Most of them are true rock plants, with tufted foliage and panicles of white, yellow, or red flowers; and many are well known as ornamental plants in our gardens, as S. umbrosa, London pride or none-so-pretty; S. granulata, white or granulated meadow saxifrage; S. hypnoides, mossy saxifrage or ladies' cushion; S. crassifolia, or thick-leaved saxifrage; S. sarmentosa, or Chinese saxifrage, which as shown in the cut puts out ornamental sarmenta (ss). The genus is a large one, containing upwards of 150 species, of which at least twelve are natives of Britain. The burnt saxifrage is Pimpinella Saxifraga; the golden saxifrage is the genus Chrysosplenium; the pepper or meadow saxifrage is Silene pratensis.

Saxifragous (səks-sif'ra-gus), a. Same as Saxifragant. [Rare.]

Saxon (səks'on), n. [L. Saxo, pl. Saxones, A. Sax. Seaxa, pl. Seaxe, Seaxan, usually derived from seax, O. H. G. sahs, a short sword, a dagger; G. Sachse, a Saxon.] 1. One of the nation or people who formerly dwelt in the northern part of Germany, and who invaded and conquered England in the fifth and sixth centuries; one of their descendants; an Anglo-Saxon; one of English race.—2. The language of the Saxons, Anglo-Saxon. The terms Saxon and Anglo-Saxon are popularly used to designate that early form of the English language which prevailed to the close of the twelfth century. See ANGLO-SAXON.—Old Saxon, Saxon as spoken on the Continent in early times in the district between the Rhine and the Elbe.—3. A native or inhabitant of modern Saxony.

Saxon (sak'son), a. 1. Pertaining to the Saxons, to their country, or to their language; Anglo-Saxon.—2. Of or pertaining to modern Saxony or its inhabitants.—Saxon architecture, the earliest stage of native English architecture, its period being from the conversion of England till the Conquest or near it, when Norman architecture began a, Tower of Sompting Church, Sussex. b, Tower of Barton-on-Humber Church, Lincolnshire. c, Long and short work. d, Window with a baluster.

Saxon Architecture.

to prevail. The few relics left us of this style exhibit its general characteristics as having been rude solidity and strength. The walls are of rough masonry, very thick, without buttresses, and sometimes of herring-bone work; the towers and pillars thick in proportion to height, the former being sometimes not more than three diameters high; the quoins or angle masonry are of hewn stones set alternately on end and horizontally; the arches of doorways and windows are rounded, or sometimes these openings have triangular heads, their jambs of long and short work carrying either rudely carved impost or capitals with square abaci. Sometimes heavy mouldings run round the arches, and when two or more arches are conjoined in an arcade these are on heavy low shafts formed like balusters. Window openings in the walls splay from both the interior and the exterior, the position of the windows being in the middle of the thickness of the wall.

Saxon-blue (sak'son-blū), n. A solution of indigo in concentrated sulphuric acid. It is much used as a dye-stuff.

Saxondom (sak'son-dum), n. Countries inhabited by Saxons; peoples or population of English or Anglo-Saxon origin.

Look now at American Saxondom; and at that little fact of the sailing of the Mayflower two hundred years ago, from Delft Haven in Holland.

Saxon-green (sak'son-grēn), n. A colour produced by dyeing yellow upon a Saxon-blue ground.

Saxonism (sak'son-izm), n. An idiom of the Saxon or early English language.

The language is full of Saxonisms, which abound more or less in every writer before Gower and Chaucer.

Saxonist (sak'son-ist), n. One versed in the Saxon language.

Saxophone (sak'so-fōn), n. One of a family of brass wind-instruments invented by M. Sax; their tones are soft and penetrating in the higher part, expressive in the middle, and full and rich in the lower part of their compass. The saxophones are six in number: the high, the soprano, the alto, the tenor, the baritone, and the bass. They are played with a single reed, and a clarinet mouthpiece.

Saxotromba (sak'so-trom-ba), n. One of a class of brass instruments introduced by M. Sax, with a wide mouthpiece and three or four cylinders. The tone partakes of the quality both of the trumpet and the bugle. The complete set is six in number: the high, soprano, alto, tenor, baritone, and bass.

Sax-tuba (saks'tū-ba), n. A brass instrument introduced by M. Sax, with wide mouthpiece and three cylinders. The tone is very sonorous.

Say (sā), v.t. pret. & pp. said, contr. from sayed; ppr. saying. [O.E. sayen, seyen, seggen, A. Sax. seggan, to say—a word common to all the Teutonic tongues, except that it is not known as Gothic; Icel. segja, D. zeggen, G. sagen.] 1. To utter, express, declare, or pronounce in words, either orally or in writing; to speak; as, he said nothing; he said many things; he says not a word; say a good word for me.

He never says a foolish thing.
Nor ever does a wise one. Rochester.

I wrote I know not what . . .
Yet something I did wish to say. Tennyson.

2. To argue; to allege by way of argument. 'After all can be said against a thing.' Tillotson.—3. To repeat; to rehearse; to recite; as, to say a lesson; to say one's prayers; to say grace.

She used every day to wend
'Bout her affairs, her spells and charms to say. Fairfax.

4. To pronounce; to recite without singing. 'Then shall be said or sung as follows,' Common Prayer.—5. To answer; to utter by way of reply; to tell. 'Say in brief the cause.' Shak.—6. To suppose; to assume to be true; to presume; to take for granted; in this sense often in the imperative. 'Troops left in Balacava, say 8000.' Sir J. M. Adye.

Well, say there is no kingdom then for Richard;
What other pleasure can the world afford? Shak.

7. To utter as an opinion; to announce as a decision; to decide; to judge.

But what it is, hard is to say,
Harder to hit. Milton.

—It says, an impersonal usage sometimes met with—it is said.

It says in the New Testament that the dead came out of their graves. W. Collins.

—It is said, they say, it is commonly reported; people assert or maintain.—To say nay, to refuse. 'As who shall say me nay.' Tennyson.

If you plead as well for them
As I can say nay to thee for myself,
No doubt we'll bring it to a happy issue. Shak.

—To say to, to think of; to judge of; to be of opinion regarding.

What say you to a letter from your friends. Shak.

—That is to say, that is; in other words; otherwise: in legal and mercantile usage, often contracted to say; as, a sum of £500 (say, five hundred pounds).—Say, Speak, Tell. Although this word is nearly synonymous with say, and in some usages with tell, yet generally the applications of these words are different. Thus we say to say an oration, to tell a story; but in these phrases say cannot be used. Yet to say a lesson is good English, and so is to say prayers. We never use the phrases to say a sermon or discourse, to say an argument, to say a speech, to say testimony. A very general use of say is to introduce a relation, narration, or recital, either of the speaker himself or of something said or done, or to be done by another. Thus, Adam said, This is bone of my bone; Noah said, Blessed be the Lord God of Shem; if we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves; Say to the cities of Judah, Behold your God; I cannot say what I should do in a similar case.

Say (sā), v.t. 1. To speak; to declare; to assert; to express an opinion; as, so he says. 2. To make answer; to reply.

To this argument we shall soon have said; for what concerns it we hear a husband divulging his household privacies? Milton.

Say (sā), n. 1. What one has to say; a speech; a story; something said; hence, an affirmation; a declaration; a statement. 'Let me say my say.' Tennyson.

The Archdeacon said out his say, standing with his back to the empty fireplace. Trollope.

2. A maxim; a saying; a saw. 'That strange palmer's boding say,' Sir W. Scott. The spelling Saye is also found.

He took it on the page's say,
Hunthill had driven these steeds away. Sir W. Scott.

Say+ (sā), n. [For assay.] 1. Assay; trial by sample; sample; taste. 'To take a say of venison, or stale fowl by your nose.' B. Jonson.

Thy tongue some say of breeding breathes. Shak.

2. Tried quality; temper; proof. 'A sword of better say.' Spenser.—To give the say, to assure the goodness of the wines and dishes, a duty formerly performed at court by the royal taster.—To give a say at, to make an attempt for.

And give a say, I will not say directly,
But very fair at the philosopher's stone. E. Jonson.

Say+ (sā), v.t. To assay; to try. 'Of all say'd yet I wish thee happiness.' Shak. 'The tailor brings a suit home; he it says.' B. Jonson.

Say+ (sā), For Sey, pret. of se (see). Saw. Chaucer.

Say,† Sayet (sā), n. [Fr. saye, It. saja, from L. saga—sagum, a coarse woollen mantle or blanket.] 1. A delicate kind of serge or woollen cloth. Halkinell.—2. A species of silk or satin. 'A kirtle of discoloured say.' Spenser. 'Thou say, thou serge, may thou buckram lord.' Shak.

Sayer (sā'er), n. One who says.

Mr. Curran was something much better than a sayer of smart sayings. Jeffrey.

Sayette (sā-et'), n. Same as Sagathy.
Saying (sā'ing), n. 1. That which is said; an expression; a sentence uttered; a declaration. 'Moses fled at this saying.' Acts vii. 29.

The sacred function can never be hurt by their sayings, if not first reproached by our doings. Atterbury.

2. A proverbial expression; a maxim; an adage. 'Blush like a black dog, as the saying is.' Shak.

Many are the sayings of the wise,
Extolling patience or the trust fortitude. Milton.

Sayman† (sā'man), n. Same as Saymaster. Bacon.

Saymaster† (sā'mas-tēr), n. [Abbrev. of assay-master.] One who makes trial or proof; an assay master. 'Great saymaster of state.' B. Jonson.

'Sblood (zblud), inter. An imprecation abbreviated from God's blood.

'Sblood, I am as melancholy as a gib-cat or a lugged bear. Shak.

Scab (skab), n. [A. Sax. scæb, from L. scabies, scab, scurf, itch, from scabo, to scratch, akin to Gr. skapto, to dig.] 1. An incrustated substance, dry and rough, formed over a sore in healing.—2. The mange in horses; a disease of sheep.—3. The itch. [Scotch.]—4. A mean, dirty, paltry fellow. Applied to persons as a term of supreme contempt and disregard. 'A scab of a currier.' Sir R. L'Estrange.

Scabbard (skab'ārd), n. [Old spellings scabert, scabert, scaberke, scaberge; of doubtful origin; the latter portion is no doubt from A. Sax. beorgan, O.H.G. bergan, to protect (comp. hauberk), the first portion being probably equivalent to scathe, harm, injury, the scabbard being what prevents the weapon from doing harm when not in use.] The sheath of a sword or other similar weapon. 'Rapier, scabbard and all.' Shak.
Scabbard (skab'ārd), v.t. To put in a scabbard or sheath.

Scabbard-fish (skab'ārd-fish), n. The Lepidopus caudatus, a beautiful fish found in the Mediterranean and Eastern Atlantic, so called because in shape it bears some resemblance to the sheath of a sword. It is of a bright silvery whiteness, with a single dorsal fin running along the back. The ventral fins are only represented by a pair of scales, hence the generic name of Lepidopus or scale-fish.

Scabbed (skabd or skab'ed), a. 1. Abounding with scabs; diseased with scabs. Bacon.—2. Mean; paltry; vile; worthless.

Scabbedness (skab'ed-nes), n. The state of being scabbed.

Scabbiness (skab'i-nes), n. The quality of being scabby.

Scabble (skab'l), v.t. pret. & pp. scabbled; ppr. scabbling. To dress a stone with a broad chisel (called in England a boaster, and in Scotland a drove) after it has been pointed or broached, and preparatory to finer dressing; to scapple.

Scabby (skab'l), a. 1. Covered with scabs; full of scabs. 'A scabby tetter.' Dryden. 2. Diseased with the scab or mange; mangy. Swift.

Scabies (skā'bi-ēz), n. [L.] Scab; mange; itch. Dunglison.

Scabiosa (skā-bi-ō'sa), n. [See SCABIOUS.] A genus of plants, nat. order Dipsacæ.

Scabious (skā'bi-us), a. [L. scabiosus, from scabies, scab.] Consisting of scabs; rough; itchy; leprous; as, scabious eruptions.

Scabious (skā'bi-us), n. Scabiosa, an extensive genus of annual and perennial herbs, belonging to the nat. order Dipsacace, natives of the Old World, especially of the Mediterranean and Eastern regions. They are annual or perennial herbs, with entire or divided leaves and heads of blue, pink, white, or yellowish flowers. S. succisa, devil's bit (which see), is a common British plant. It possesses great astringency but no important medicinal virtues, although it was formerly supposed to be of great efficacy in all scaly eruptions, hence the name scabious.

Scabbling (skab'ling), n. [From scabble.] A chip or fragment of stone.

Scabredity† (skab-red'i-ti), n. [L. scabredo, from scaber, rough.] Roughness; ruggedness. Burton.

Scabrous (skab'rus), a. [L. scabrosus, from scaber, scabri, rough, scabby, from scabies, scab.] 1. Rough; rugged; having sharp points or little asperities: applied chiefly in zool. and bot. to surfaces. — 2. Harsh; un-musical.

His verse is scabrous and hobbling. Dryden.

Scabrouness (skab'rus-nes), n. The quality or state of being scabrous; roughness; ruggedness.

Scabwort (skab'wert), n. A plant, Inula Helenum.

Scad (skad), n. 1. A fish, the shad (which see). — 2. A fish of the genus Caranx (C. Trachurus); the horse-mackerel.

Scafold (skaf'old), n. [O. Fr. eschafaut, eschafault (Mod. Fr. échafaud); L. L. scadafaltum, from ez, and cadafaltum; it. catafalco, a scaffold, a catafalque. See CATAFALQUE.] 1. A temporary gallery or stage raised either for exhibiting a spectacle upon or for holding spectators. Shak. — 2. A stage or elevated platform for the execution of a criminal. — 3. A temporary structure of timbers, boards, or planks erected by the wall of a building to support the workmen and materials.

Scaffold (skaf'old), v. t. To furnish with a scaffold; to sustain; to uphold.

Scaffolding† (skaf'old-āj), n. A scaffold; a stage; the timber-work of a stage; scaffolding. Shak.

Scaffolding (skaf'old-ing), n. 1. A frame or structure for temporary support in an elevated place. — 2. In building, the temporary combination of timber-work by the means of upright poles and horizontal pieces, on which latter are laid the boards for supporting the builders in carrying up the different stages or floors of a building, or plasterers in executing their work in the interior of houses, and which are struck or removed as soon as they have answered their purpose. 3. That which sustains; a frame. 'This scaffolding of the body.' Pope. — 4. Materials for scaffolds.

Scalf-raff (skaf'raf), n. Riffraff; rabble. Sir W. Scott. [Scotch.]

Scaglia (skā'yi-a), n. [It., the scale of a fish, a shell, a chip of marble or stone.] An Italian calcareous rock, the equivalent of our white chalk. It is of a red colour, and has a fissile structure, hence the name.

Scagliola (skā'yi-ō'la), n. [It. scagliuola, dim. of scaglia. See SCAGLIA.] In arch. a composition, imitative of marble, used for enriching columns and internal walls of buildings. It is composed of gypsum, or sulphate of lime, calcined and reduced to a fine powder, with the addition of water, by which a fine paste is made. While soft it is bestudded with splinters of spar, marble, granite, bits of concrete, coloured gypsum, or veins of clay, in a semi-fluid state. The substances used to colour the spots and patches are the several ochres, boles, &c. It is smoothed with fine iron tools, and afterwards polished.

Scath (skāth), n. Scathe; harm; damage. Burns. [A Scotch spelling.]

Scathless (skāth'les), a. Unharmd; uninjured. [A Scotch spelling.]

Scala (skā'la), n. [L., a ladder, a flight of stairs. See SCALE.] A surgical instrument for reducing dislocations. — Scala tympani, in anat. the superior spiral cavity of the cochlea. — Scala vestibuli, the inferior spiral cavity of the cochlea.

Scalable (skā'la-bl), a. Capable of being scaled.

Scalade, Scalado (ska-lād', ska-lā'do), n. [Fr. scalade, Scalado, from L. scala, a ladder. See SCALE.] An assault on a fortified place, in which the soldiers enter the place by means of ladders; escalade. 'The nocturnal scalade of needy heroes.' Ar- buthnot. 'Won one town of importance by scalado.' Bacon.

Scalaria (ska-lā'ri-a), n. [L. scalaria, a flight of steps—from the form of the shells.] A genus of marine, turreted, gastropodous mollusca, with anti-longitudinal raised ribs. They are found in sandy mud, at depths varying from 7 to 13 fathoms. The molluscs of this genus have been commonly called wentletraps, a corruption of the German word wendel-treppe, a winding staircase. The typical and most celebrated species of wentletrap is S. pretiosa, which was formerly rare, and brought a large price in the market. It is now found to be not an uncommon shell in the Eastern seas.

Scalaria pretiosa (Wentletrap).

Scalariform (ska-lā'ri-form), a. [L. scalaris, resembling a flight of stairs or a ladder, and forma, form.] Shaped like a ladder; resembling a ladder. — Scalariform vessels, in bot. tubes met with in plants, especially in ferns, distinguished by having bars at regular intervals so as to resemble a ladder.

Scalary (skā'la-ri), a. Resembling a ladder; formed with steps. 'Certain elevated places and scalary ascents.' Sir T. Browne. [Rare.]

Scalawag (skal-a-wag), n. See SCALLAWAG.

Scald (skald), v. t. [O. Fr. eschalder, eschau-der, Mod. Fr. échauder, il scaldare, to heat, warm, scorch, scald, from L. ez, intens., and calidus, calidus, hot.] 1. To burn, or painfully affect and injure with or as with hot liquor; as, to scald the foot with boiling water.

I am scalded with my violent motion. Shak.
It depends not on his will to persuade himself that what actually scalds him feels cold. Locke.

Here the blue flames of scalding brimstone fall. Cowley.

2. To expose to a boiling or violent heat over a fire or in water or other liquor; as, to scald meat or milk.

Scald (skald), n. [From the verb.] A burn or injury to the skin and flesh by hot liquor or vapour. — Burn, Scald. See BURN.

Scald (skald), n. Scab; scall; scurf on the head. 'Scurf and filthy scald.' Spenser.

Scald (skald), a. [That is, scalded, or affected with scall. See SCALL.] Scurvy; palsy; poor; as, scald rhymers. Shak.

Scald (skald), n. [Icel. skáld, Sw. skald. Origin disputed.] An ancient Scandinavian poet; one whose occupation was to compose poems in honour of distinguished men and their achievements, and to recite and sing them on public occasions. The scalds of the Norsemen answered to the bards of the Britons or Celts. Written also Skald.

And there, in many a stormy vale,
The scald has told his wondrous tale. Sir W. Scott.

Scald, Scald (skald), v. t. To scold; to rate. [Scotch.]

Scaldert (skal'dér), n. A scald; a Scandinavian poet. T. Warton. [An erroneous form.]

Scald-fish (skald'fish), n. A marine flat-fish, Rhombus Arnoglossus, allied to the turbot, sole, and flounder. It is not uncommon on our coasts.

Scald-head (skald'hed), n. [From scald, scurf, scurvy.] A fungous parasitic disease mostly of the hairy scalp, in which the parasites are indistinct, often distant patches, gradually spreading till the whole head is covered as with a helmet; skin below the scabs red, shining, dotted with papillous apertures, excreting fresh matter; roots of the hair often destroyed. It is known in medical phraseology as Favus, Tinea Favosa, and Porrigo Scutulata.

Scaldic (skal'dik), a. Pertaining to the scalds or Norse poets; composed by scalds.

Scalding, Scalding-hot (skald'ing, skald'ing-hot), a. So hot as to scald the skin.

Scale (skāl), n. [A Sax. scālu, scēlu, the dish of a balance, a balance; Icel. skál, a dish, a balance; Dan. skaal, a bowl, the scale of a balance; D. schaal, G. schale, a flat dish, a balance. Scale, a thin lamina, is an allied word from the same root. See next art.] 1. The dish of a balance; and hence, the balance itself, or whole instrument; as, to turn the scale: generally used in the plural when applied to the whole instrument.

Long time in even scale
The battle hung. Milton.
The scales are turn'd; her kindness weighs no more
Now than my vows. Waller.

2. pl. The sign of the Balance, or Libra, in the zodiac.

Scale (skāl), n. [A Sax. scale, scalu, a shell, a husk; Dan. skæl, the scale of a fish, &c.; skæl, peel, rind, shell; Icel. skel, a shell. See above. Akin shale, shell, skill, skull.]

1. One of the imbricated plates on the exterior of certain animals: (a) one of the thin, small, imbricated plates which protect the skin of many fishes. They are developed beneath the true epiderm, and consist of alternate layers of membrane, of horny matter, and occasionally of phosphate of lime. Fishes are sometimes classed, in accordance with the structure of their scales, into Ctenoid, Ganoid, Cycloid, and Placoid. (b) One of the laminae, composed of horny membrane, or of a mixture of horny and bony matter, belonging to the dermoskeleton of reptiles. These are modifications of the epidermis, and are sometimes called Scutes. (c) One of the bony plates formed by deposits taking place in the epidermis or outer layer of the skin of certain mammals, Scales of Fishes.

1, Ctenoid Scale of the Perch. 2, Cycloid Scale of the Carp. 3, Ganoid Scales of Dipterous. 4, Placoid Scale of Ray.

as the pangolins or scaly ant-eaters and the armadillos. — 2. Anything resembling the scale of a fish or other animal; anything exfoliated or desquamated, or tending to become exfoliated or desquamated; as, a scale of bone, iron, and the like; specifically, (a) in bot. a small rudimentary or metamorphosed leaf, scale-like in form and often in arrangement, constituting the covering of the leaf-buds of the deciduous trees in cold climates, the involucre of the Composite, the bracts of the catkin, the imbricated ground leaves which constitute the bulb, and the like. (b) An incrustation deposited in the inside of a vessel in which water is habitually heated, as in a steam-boiler. (c) The thin metallic lining of the handle of a pocket-knife.

Scale (skāl), v. t. 1. To strip or clear of scales; as, to scale a fish. — 2. To take off in thin laminae or scales. — 3. To pare off a surface. 'If all the mountains were scal'd, and the earth made even.' T. Burnet. — 4. [Scotch and North English.] (a) To spill; as, to scale water. (b) To spread, as manure or loose substances. (c) To cause to separate; to disperse; as, to scale a crowd. Usually written Skail. — 5. In gun. to clean the inside of a cannon by the explosion of a small quantity of powder.

Scale (skāl), v. t. To weigh, as in scales; to measure; to compare; to estimate.

You have found,
Scaling his present bearing with his past,
That he's your fixed enemy. Shak.

Scale (skāl), v. i. 1. To separate and come off in thin layers or laminae.

The old shells of the lobster scale off. Bacon.

2. [Now only Scotch and Northern English.] To separate; to break up; to disperse. In this sense usually written Skail.

They would no longer abide, but scal'd, and departed away. Holmes.

Scale (skāl), n. [L. scala, a ladder, from root of scando, to mount, Skr. skand, to ascend.] 1. A ladder; series of steps; means of ascending.

Love refines
The thoughts, and heart enlarges . . . is the scale
By which to heavenly love thou mayest ascend. Milton.

2. The act of storming a place by mounting the walls on ladders; an escalade or scalade. 'A city strong . . . by battery, scale, and mine assaulting.' Milton. — 3. Anything graduated, especially when applied as a measure or rule, or marked by lines or degrees at regular intervals; as, specifically, (a) a mathematical instrument consisting of a slip of wood, ivory, or metal, with one or more sets of spaces graduated and numbered on its surface, for measuring or laying off distances, &c., as in drawing, plotting, and the like. See GUNTER'S SCALE, Plane scale (under PLANE), Diagonal scale (under DIAGONAL). (b) Any instrument, figure, or scheme graduated for the purpose of measuring extent or proportions. (c) A basis for a numerical system; as, the binary scale; the decimal scale. (d) In music, a succession of notes arranged in the order of pitch, and comprising those sounds which may occur in a piece of music written in a given key. In its simplest form the scale consists of seven steps or degrees counted upward in a regular order from a root or prime (the tonic or key-note), to which series the eighth is added to form the octave. A scale may have its key-note at any pitch, no one being more natural than another; but it has been the practice among musicians to consider the scale having C for its key-note as the natural, model, or normal scale. The diatonic scale ascends by five steps (tones) and two half-steps (semitones), taking for the names of the notes the letters C, D, E, F, G, A, B, C, or the syllables do, re, mi, fa, sol, la, si, do; the two semitones occurring between E and F (mi and fa) and B and C (si and do). When the scale is graduated all the way by a series of twelve half-steps or semitones it is called the chromatic scale. A scale is said to be major when the interval between the key-note and the third above it, as from C to E, consists of two tones; it is called minor when the interval between the key-note and its third, as from A to C, consists of a tone and a half. The term scale is also applied by some musicians as a synonym of compass, that is, the series of notes producible by various voices or instruments; as, the scale of a pianoforte, violin, or the like.—4. Succession of ascending or descending steps or degrees; progressive series; scheme of comparative rank or order; gradation.

The higher nature still advances, and preserves his superiority in the scale of being. Addison.

5. Relative dimensions without difference in proportion of parts; size or degree of the parts or components of any complex thing compared with other like things; as, a plan on the scale of an inch to 100 yards.

Scale (skāl), v.t. pret. & pp. scaled; ppr. scaling. [See the above noun, and comp. scalade.] To climb, as by a ladder; to ascend by steps; to clamber up.

Often have I scal'd the craggy oak. Spenser.

Scale† (skāl), v.s. To afford an ascent, as a ladder or stairs; to lead up by steps or stairs.

Satan from hence, now on the lower stair,
That scal'd by steps of gold to heaven's gate,
Looks down with wonder. Milton.

Scale-armour (skāl'ār-mēr), n. Armour consisting of small plates of steel partly overlapping each other, like the scales of a fish. From its pliability it was a favourite protection for the neck, hanging down like a curtain from the helmet.

Scale-beam (skāl'bēm), n. The beam or lever of a balance.

Scale-beetle (skāl'bē-tl), n. A name given to the tiger-beetle.

Scale-board (skāl'bōrd, often skab'bōrd), n. 1. A thin veneer of wood used for covering the surfaces of articles of furniture, for backing looking-glasses, and the like.—2. In printing, a thin slip of wood employed in justifying a page to its true length.

Scale-fern (skāl'fēr), n. A popular name for a fern of the genus Ceterach (C. officinarum), so named from the imbricated tawny scales at the back of the fronds. To this plant was formerly attributed a marvellous influence over the liver and spleen, and Vitruvius states that it had the effect of destroying the latter organ in certain Cretan swine which fed on it. It is a British species, and is said to be used as a bait for fish on the coast of Wales.

Scale-fish (skāl'fīsh), n. A dealer's name for the pollack, the torsk, the hake, and the haddock when dry-cured, which have only half the commercial value of the cod. Stimmonds.

Scale-insect (skāl'in-sekt), n. A name given to an insect belonging to the family Coccidae, many of which live as parasites on various plants, particularly on hot-house plants, and do them considerable injury. They receive their name from their resemblance to small scales when sticking close to the bark or leaves.

Scaleless (skāl'les), a. Destitute of scales.

Scale-moss (skāl'mos), n. A popular name given to the Jungermannias, plants resembling moss, and belonging to the order Hepaticæ. They grow on the trunks of trees, in damp earth, and in similar places, and are so called from the small scale-like leaves.

Scale-mosses.—1, Jungermannia ciliaris; 2, J. bidentata (both natural size).

Scalene (ska-lēn'), a. [Gr. skalēnos, limping, halting, uneven.] In math. a term applied to a triangle of which the three sides are unequal. A cone or cylinder is also said to be scalene when its axis is inclined to its base, but in this case the term oblique is more frequently used.

Scalene (ska-lēn'), a. A scalene triangle.

Scalenoedron (ska-lēnō-hē'dron), n. [Gr. skalēnos, uneven, and hedra, seat, base.] In crystal, a pyramidal form under the rhombohedral system, in which the pyramids are six-sided and the faces are scalene triangles.

Scalenoust (ska-lē'nus), a. Same as Scalene.

Scalenus (ska-lē'nus), n. [Gr. skalēnos, irregular, unequal.] In anat. one of a pair of muscles of the neck, situated between the transverse processes of the cervical vertebrae and the upper part of the thorax. Its use is to move the neck to one side when it acts singly, or to bend it forward when both muscles act; and when the neck is fixed it serves to elevate the ribs and dilate the chest.

Scaler (skāl'ēr), n. One who or that which scales.

Scale-stone (skāl'stōn), n. Tabular spar; schaalstein.

Scaliness (skāl'i-nes), n. The state of being scaly; roughness.

Scaling-bar (skāl'ing-bār), n. A bar or rod for removing the incrustation or scale from heating surfaces, as from the surface of a steam-boiler.

Scaling-hammer (skāl'ing-ham-ēr), n. A hammer for removing scale from heating surfaces.

Scaling-ladder (skāl'ing-lad'dēr), n. A ladder made for enabling troops to scale a wall. Such ladders are generally made in lengths of 12 and 7½ feet, and can be joined by fitting the end of one into the socket of another.

Scallola (skal-yi-ō'la). Same as Scagliola.

Scall (skal), n. [Dan. skal, peel, husk, skaldet, bald; Icel. skall, a bald head; akin to scale.] Scab; scurf; scabbiness; leprosy.

It is a dry scall, even a leprosy on the head.

Lev. xiii. 30.

—Dry scall, psoriasis, or itch.—Moist scall, the impetigo or eczema.

Scallawag (skal'la-wag), n. A miserable scamp; a scapegrace. 'You good-for-nothin' young scallawag.' Halibutson. Written also Scalawag. [American.]

Scalled (skald), a. Scurfy; scabby; scald.

Scallion (skal'yun), n. [It. scalogno, from L. cepa Ascalonia or allium Ascalonium, the onion of Ascalon.] A plant, the Allium ascalonicum, a kind of onion. See SHALLOT.

Scallion-faced† (skal'yun-fäst), a. Having a mean scurvy face or appearance. Nares says the true sense is stinking-faced, from scallion, a shallot.

His father's diet was new cheese and onions.

—What a scallion-faced rascal 'tis! Beau. & Fl.

Scallop (skal'lop, skol'lop), n. [O. Fr. escolope, lit. a shell-fish, being no doubt from some of the Teutonic words equivalent to E. shell, scale; comp. D. schelp, schulp, shell, cockle-shell. See SCALE.] 1. A marine lamellibranchiate mollusc of section Asiphonida, family Ostreidae, and genus Pecten. The shell is bivalve, the hinge toothless, having a small ovated hollow, from which alternate ribs and furrows usually run diverging to the margin of the shell. Like the oyster the scallop habitually lies on one side, the lower valve being the deepest, and the foot wanting or rudimentary. There are numerous species used for food, some of which are found in the seas of most climates. The shell occurs in abundance on the coast of Palestine, and was formerly worn by pilgrims as a mark that they had been to the Holy Land. See PECTEN. Hence.—2. In her. a scallop shell as the badge of a pilgrim. This shell is also the symbol of St. James the Greater, who is usually represented in the garb of a pilgrim. In this sense usually written Escallop.—3. A kind of dish for baking oysters in.—4. A recess or curving of the edge of anything, like the segment of a circle. Written also Scallop.—Scallop budding, in hort. a method of budding performed by paring a thin tongue-shaped portion of bark from the stock, and applying the bud without investing it of its portion of wood, so that the barks of both may exactly fit, and then tying it in the usual way.

Scallop (skal'lop or skol'lop), v.t. 1. To mark or cut the edge or border of into segments of circles. 'Scallop every winding shore.' Shenstone.—2. To cook in a shell or scallop, as oysters. See SCALLOPED.

Scalloped (skal'lopt or skol'lopt), p. and a. 1. Furnished with a scallop; made or done with or in a scallop.—2. Cut at the edge or border into segments of circles. 'A wide subsarbed arch with scalloped ornaments.' Gray.—Scalloped or scoloped oysters, are oysters baked with bread-crumbs, cream, pepper, salt, nutmeg, and a little butter. This was at first literally done in distinct scallop shells, and afterwards in a dish for the purpose called a scallop.

Scalops (skāl'ops), n. [Gr., a mole.] A genus of Talpidae or moles, inhabiting North America, and of which S. aquaticus (the shrew-mole) is the most familiar species. See SHREW-MOLE.

Scalp (skalp), n. [Probably of same origin as scale shell; comp. D. schelp or schulp, a shell; Icel. skálp, a sheath.] 1. The head; the skull. Shak.—2. The outer covering of the skull, composed of skin and of the expanded tendon of the occipito-frontal muscle, and of intermediate cellular tissue and blood-vessels. Hence the skin of the head or a part of it, with the hair belonging to it torn or cut off, as by the American Indians, as a mark of victory over an enemy.

By the bare scalp of Robin Hood's fat friar,

This fellow were a king for our wild faction. Shak.

Scalp (skalp), v.t. To deprive of the scalp or integuments of the head.

Scalp (skalp), n. A bed of oysters or mussels; a scamp. [Scotch.]

Scalpel (skal'pel), n. [L. scalpellum, dim. of scalprum, a knife, from scalpo, to cut, to scrape.] A knife used in anatomical dissections and surgical operations.

Scalpelliform (skal-pel'i-form), a. [L. scalpellum, and forma, shape. See SCALPEL.] In bot. having the form of a scalpel, and planted vertically on a branch.

Scalpellum (skal-pel'um), n. A genus of Crustacea belonging to the Cirripedia or barnacle order. S. vulgare is a common species.

Scalper, Scalping-iron (skal'pēr, skal'ping-i-ēr), n. [See SCALPEL.] An instrument of surgery, used in scraping foul and carious bones; a raspatory.

Scalping-knife (skal'ping-nif), n. A knife used by the Indians of America in scalping their prisoners.

Scalp-lock (skalp'lok), n. A long tuft of hair left on the crown of the head by the warriors of some of the North American Indian tribes.

Scalpriform (skalp'ri-form), n. [L. scalprum, a knife, and forma, form, shape.] Chisel-shaped; specifically applied to the incisor teeth of the Rodentia, which by deficiency of the enamel on one side present a cutting edge like that of a knife.

Scalprum (skalp'rum), n. [L., a knife.] In zool. the cutting edge of the incisor teeth.

Scaly (skāl'i), a. 1. Covered or abounding with scales; as, a scaly fish; the scaly crocodile.—2. Resembling scales, laminae, or layers.—3. In bot. composed of scales lying over each other; as, a scaly bulb; having scales scattered over it; as, a scaly stem.—4. Shabby, mean, stingy. [Slang.]—Scaly ant-eater, the pangolin, a mammal belonging to the genus Manis (which see).

Scaly-winged (skāl'i-wingd), a. Having wings with scales, as some insects.

Scamble (skam'bl), v. t. pret. & pp. scambled; ppr. scambling. [Comp. O.D. schampelen, to deviate, to slip; D. schommelen, to stir, to shake.] 1. To stir quick; to be busy; to scramble; to struggle; to be bold or turbulent.—2. To shift awkwardly; to sprawl; to be awkward. 'A fine old hall, but a scambling house.' Evelyn. [In this sense usually written Shamble.]

Scapular, Scapulary (skap'ü-lér, skáp'ü-lá-ri), n. 1. A kind of garment or portion of dress, consisting of two bands of woollen stuff—one going down the breast and the other on the back, over the shoulders—worn by a religious. The original scapular was first introduced by St. Benedict, in lieu of a heavy cowl for the shoulders, designed to carry loads. — Tongue scapular, a scapular on which twelve tongues of red cloth were sewn, put on a monk who had offended with his tongue. — 2. In surg. a bandage for the shoulder-blade.

Scapus (ská'pus), n. [L. a stalk.] 1. In ornith. the stem or trunk of a feather, including the hollow base or quill and the solid part supporting the barbs. — 2. In bot. see SCAPE. 3. In arch. the shaft of a column.

Scar (skär), n. [In the sense of a wound, perhaps an abbreviation of eschar, Fr. escharre, escharre, the scab or part that separates from a sore, the scab as of a wound, from Gr. eschara, the scab or eschar on a wound caused by burning; but in this, as in other senses, it may be of Teutonic origin, from root of scare, shear, short; comp. Dan. skaar, a cut, an incision; O.G. scarra, G. schar, a cutting. In meaning 4 same as Icel. skor, a precipice, a rift in a rock. Dan. skær, a cliff, a rock from same root. Comp. also Armor. skarr, a crack, a chink, skarra, to crack, to chink.] 1. A mark in the skin or flesh of an animal, made by a wound or an ulcer, and remaining after the wound or ulcer is healed; a cicatrix; as, the soldier is proud of his scars.
They stood aloof, the scars remaining,
Like cliffs which had been rent asunder.

2. A hurt; a wound. Shak. — 3. Any mark or injury; a blemish.
The earth had the beauty of youth, and not a wrinkle, scar, or fracture on its body.

4. A cliff; a precipitous bank; a naked detached rock; a bare and broken place on the side of a hill or mountain. Also written Scatur.
O, sweet and far, from cliff and scar,
The horns of Elifand faintly blowing.

In this sense it forms or enters into many place-names in Britain and Ireland, as Scarborough, Scarcliff, &c. — 5. In bot. a mark on a stem or branch seen after the fall of a leaf, or on a seed after the separation of its stem.

Scar (skär), v.t. pret. & pp. scarred; ppr. scarring. To mark with a scar or scars; to wound; to hurt.

I'll not shed her blood;
Nor scar that whiter skin of hers than snow. Shak.
There rose a hill that none but man could climb,
Scarred with a hundred wintry water-courses.

Scar (skär), v.i. To be covered with a scar; to form a scar; as, the wound scars over.

Scari (skär), v.t. To scare; to terrify.

That liv'd upon the doing of her base pleasures.

Scarabæidæ (skar-a-bé'i-dé), n. pl. [L. scarabæus, and Gr. eidos, resemblance.] A very extensive group of beetles, forming the chief part of the section Lamellicornes, and having the genus Scarabæus of Linn. as its type.

Scarabæus sacer, or Sacred Beetle.

Latreille divides the Scarabæidæ into six sections, viz. Coprophagi (dung-eaters), Arenicoli (dwellers in sand), Xylophili (delighting in wood), Phyllophagi (leaf-eaters), Anthobi (living on flowers), and Melitophili (delighting in honey). To the first section belong the dung-feeding Scarabæi and the sacred beetle of the Egyptians. See SCARABÆUS.

Scarabæus (skar-a-bé'us), n. [L. scarabæus.] An extensive genus of coleopterous insects, placed by Linn. at the head of the insect tribes, and answering to the section Lamellicornes of Latreille. They are sometimes called dung-beetles, from their habit of inclosing their eggs in pellets of dung, which are placed in holes excavated for their reception. By the French entomologists of the present day, as well as by some English writers, the name Scarabæus is still retained generically for the gigantic insects placed by Linn. at the head of the genus, such as the elephant and hercules beetles. The S. sacer, or sacred beetle of the Egyptians, was regarded with great veneration; and figures of it, plain or inscribed with characters, were habitually worn by the ancient Egyptians as an amulet.

Scarlet (skär'let), n. [O.Fr. escarlate, Mod. Fr. escarlate, It. scarlato; generally referred to Ar. or Per. eskarlät, sakarlät, but the eastern forms are as likely to be derived from the European as the latter from them. Another suggestion is L. galaticus, galaticus ruber (Galatian red) having been employed to signify scarlet, from cochineal being received from Galatia. The absence of a form intermediate between galaticus and scarlet militates against this supposition. Wedgwood suggests a derivation from the L. caro, carnis, flesh, the It. scarlatino, flesh-coloured, becoming Venetian scarlatin, mixed white and red.] 1. A beautiful bright red colour, brighter than crimson. The finest scarlet dye is obtained from cochineal.—2. Cloth of a scarlet colour; scarlet robe or dress.

See FLAT, n. (b) Cloths, or drop-scenes. See DROP-SCENE. (c) Borders or soffits, slips of canvas hung from the top of the stage, and which may either represent the sky, or a mass of overhanging foliage, &c. (d) Wings, long, narrow, upright scenes on frames at each side of the stage, having much the same effect as the borders.—Set scenes, scenes made up of many parts mounted on frames which fit into each other, as an interior with walls, doors, windows, fireplace, &c., a garden with built-up terraces, &c.—7. A part of a play; a division of an act; so much of an act of a play as represents what passes between the same persons in the same place. A play is divided into acts, and acts are divided into scenes. In the French stage every entry of an actor constitutes a new scene. In the English stage the subdivision is extremely arbitrary, the scenes in most plays being far more numerous than the actual changes of scene, while at the same time the French rule is not observed, and actors enter in the middle of a scene.—8. An exhibition of strong feeling between two or more persons, usually of a pathetic or passionate kind, such as is represented in a drama or depicted in a romance; a theatrical display; an artificial or affected action or course of action; as, do not get up a scene here; I hate scenes.

Probably no lover of scenes would have had very long to wait for some explosion between parties, both equally ready to take offence, and careless of giving it. De Quincey.

—Scene painting, a department of the art of painting governed by the laws of perspective, applied to the peculiar exigencies of a theatre. It is conducted chiefly in temper or water-colours, and admits of the most striking effects.—Behind the scenes, lit. behind the scenery of a theatre, in the back of the stage; hence, having information not patent to the public of the motives actuating to a certain course of conduct and of the schemes by which an object is to be attained; specially acquainted with the motives influencing the actions of a party or an individual.

You see that the world is governed by very different personages to what is imagined by those who are not behind the scenes. Disraeli.

Scene (sēn), v.t. pret. & pp. scened; ppr. scening. To exhibit; to make an exhibition or scene of; to display; to set out.

Our food is plainer, but eaten with a better appetite; our course of employment and action the very same, only not scened so illustriously, nor set off with so good company and conversation. Abp. Sancroft.

Scepis (sep'sis), n. [Gr. skepsis, doubt, hesitation, from skeptomai, to look at or consider carefully.] Scepticism; sceptical philosophy.

Among their products were the system of Locke, the scepis of Hume, the critical philosophy of Kant.

James Martineau.

Scepter (sep'tēr), n. Same as Sceptre.

Sceptic (sep'tik), n. [Fr. sceptique, from Gr. skeptikos, thoughtful, reflective, sceptic, from skepsis, investigation, speculation, doubt, from skeptomai, to look about, to look carefully, to examine critically, from same root as L. specio, spectro (whence spectacle, &c.)] One who doubts the truth and reality of any principle or system of principles or doctrines; one who disbelieves or hesitates to believe; a disbeliever.

Whatever sceptic could inquire for,
For every 'why' he had a 'wherefore.' Hudibras.

Specifically, (a) in philos. a Pyrrhonist or follower of Pyrrho, the founder of a sect of philosophers who maintained that no certain inferences can be drawn from the reports of the senses, and who therefore doubted of everything. (b) A person who doubts the existence and perfections of God or the truth of revelation; one who disbelieves in the divine origin of the Christian religion. By some writers spelled Skeptic.

Suffer not your faith to be shaken by the sophistries of sceptics. Clarke.

Sceptic (sep'tik), a. Same as Sceptical.

Sceptical (sep'tik-al), a. Belonging to or characteristic of a sceptic or scepticism; holding the opinions of a sceptic; as, (a) hesitating to admit the certainty of doctrines or principles; doubting of everything. 'Sceptical and wavering minds.' Bentley.

If any one pretends to be so sceptical as to deny his own existence, . . . let him for me enjoy his beloved happiness of being nothing, until hunger or some other pain convince him of the contrary. Locke.

(b) Doubting or denying the truth of revelation.

The sceptical system subverts the whole foundation of morals. R. Hall.

Sceptically (sep'tik-al-lī), adv. In a sceptical manner; with doubt.

We shall not ourselves venture to determine anything on so great a point; but, sceptically, leave it undecided. Cicardworth.

Scepticalness (sep'tik-al-nes), n. The state or quality of being sceptical; doubt; profession of doubt. 'Continual wavering or scepticalness.' Fuller.

Scepticism (sep'ti-sizm), n. [Fr. scepticisme. See SCPTIC.] The doctrines or opinions of a sceptic; disbelief or inability to believe; doubt; incredulity; as, his statements were received with much scepticism; scepticism as to the theory of development. Specifically, (a) the doctrines of the Pyrrhonists or sceptical philosophers; universal doubt; the scheme of philosophy which denies the certainty of any knowledge respecting the phenomena of nature; that tendency of thought, or system of doctrine, the object of which is, by denying the existence of all grounds of knowledge, to introduce universal doubt and suspension of assent.

But that all his (Berkeley's) arguments are, in reality, merely sceptical appears from this, that they admit of no answer and produce no conviction. Their only effect is to cause that momentary amazement and irresolution and confusion which is the result of scepticism. Hume.

(b) A doubting of the truth of revelation, or a denial of the divine origin of the Christian religion, or of the being, perfections, or truth of God. 'A medium, namely, moral certainty, between scepticism on one hand and papal infallibility on the other.' Waterland.

Scepticize (sep'ti-siz), v. i. pret. scepticized; ppr. scepticizing. To act the sceptic; to doubt; to pretend to doubt of everything.

You can afford to scepticize, where no one else will so much as hesitate. Shaftesbury.

Sceptre (sep'tēr), n. [Fr., from L. sceptrum, from Gr. skēptron, a staff or stick to lean upon; as staff, as the badge of command, from skēpto, to prop or lean.] 1. A staff or baton borne by a monarch or other ruler, as a symbol of office or authority; a royal or imperial mace. Est. v. 2. Hence—2. Royal power or authority; as, to assume the sceptre.

The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, till Shiloh come.

Gen. xlix. 10.

Sceptre (sep'tēr), v. t. pret. & pp. sceptred; ppr. sceptring. To give a sceptre to; to invest with royal authority, or with the ensign of authority. 'Thy cheeks buffeted, thy head smitten, thy hand sceptred with a reed.' By. Hall.

To Britain's queen the sceptred suppliant bends.

Tickell.

The only species known is found in Siberia, Greece, the whole of the continent of Europe to the south, and the Mediterranean coasts of Africa. It haunts thick herbage and grassy places.

Schema (skē'ma), n. 1. In the system of Kant, an object which exists in the understanding independently of matter; a synonym of form.

The schema is, in itself, always a mere product of the imagination. But as the synthesis of imagination has for its aim no single intuition, but merely unity in the determination of sensibility, the schema is clearly distinguishable from the image. Thus, if I place five points one after another . . . this is an image of the number five. On the other hand, if I only think a number in general, which may be either five or a hundred, this thought is rather the representation of a method representing in an image a sum (e.g. a thousand) in conformity with a conception, than the image itself, an image which I should find difficulty in rendering perceptible to sight, and comparing with the conception. Now this representation of a general procedure of the imagination to present its image to a conception, I call the schema of the conception. Translation of Kant.

2. In the system of Leibnitz, the principle which is essential to each monad, and which constitutes the characteristics proper to each of them.

Schematic (skē-mat'ik), a. Pertaining to a scheme or schema.

They have been compelled to violate them in different ways, in their various and contradictory attempts to reduce these four moods to their schematic properties. Sir W. Hamilton.

Schematism (skē'mat-izm), n. [Gr. schēmatismos, from schēma. See SCHEME.] 1. In astrol. the combination of the aspects of heavenly bodies.—2. Particular form or disposition of a thing; an exhibition in outline of any systematic arrangements; outline; figure. [Rare.]

Every particle of matter, whatever form or schematism it puts on, must in all conditions be equally extended, and therefore take up the same room. Creach.

Schematist (skē'mat-ist), n. A projector; one given to forming schemes; a schemer.

The treasurer maketh little use of the schematists, who are daily plying him with their visions, but he is thoroughly convinced by the comparison that his own notions are the best. Swift.

Schematize (skē'mat-iz), v. t. pret. & pp. schematized; ppr. schematizing. To form into a scheme or schemes.

Scheme (skēm), n. [Fr. schème, L. schēma, from Gr. schēma, from schēin, to have, to hold, to hold or keep in a certain direction.]

Fäte, fär, fat, fäll; mé, met, hér; pine, pin; nôte, not, möve; tûbe, tub, bull;

oil, pound; ü, Sc. abune; y, Sc. fey.

1. A combination of things connected and adjusted by design; a system; a plan.

We shall never be able to give ourselves a satisfactory account of the divine conduct, without forming such a scheme of things as shall take in time and eternity. Atterbury.

2. A plan of something to be done; a design; a project; as, to carry out a scheme. 'Forms the well-concerted scheme of mischief.' Rowe.

The stoical scheme of supplying our wants by lopping off our desires, is like cutting off our feet when we want shoes. Swift.

3. In astrol. a representation of the aspects of the celestial bodies; any astrological figure of the heavens.

It is a scheme and face of heaven, As th' aspects are disposed this even. Hudibras.

4. The representation of any design or geometrical figure by lines so as to make it comprehensible; a diagram. 'To draw an exact scheme of Constantinople, or a map of France.' South.—Scheme of division, in Scots judicial procedure, a tabular statement drawn out to show how it is proposed to divide a common fund amongst the several claimants thereon, or to allocate any fund or burden on the different parties liable.

Scheme (skēm), v. t. pret. & pp. schemed; ppr. scheming. To plan; to contrive; to plot; to project; to design.

In his youth he (Coleridge) schemed an epic which might have set him on the same stately pinnacle with Milton; but it was his fate to scheme, while Milton, heroic in every fibre, accomplished. P. Bayne.

Scheme (skēm), v. i. To form a plan; to contrive.

By Unio and yourself, I schemed and wrought, Until I overthrew him. Tennyson.

Scheme-arch (skēm'ārch), n. [It. arco scemo, an incomplete arch.] An arch which forms a portion of a circle less than a semicircle. Sometimes erroneously written Skene-arch.

Schemeful (skēm'fūl), a. Full of schemes or plans.

Schemer (skēm'ēr), n. One who schemes or contrives; a projector; a contriver; a plotter.

It is a lesson to all schemers and confederates in guilt, to teach them this truth, that when their scheme does not succeed, they are sure to quarrel amongst themselves. Paley.

Scheming (skēm'ing), p. and a. Planning; contriving.—2. Given to forming schemes; artful; intriguing.

May you just heaven, that darkens o'er me, send One flash, that, missing all these else, may make My scheming brain a cinder, if I lie. Tennyson.

Schemingly (skēm'ing-lī), adv. By scheming or contriving.

Schemist (skēm'ist), n. A schemer; a projector. Waterland.

Schene (skēn), n. [Gr. schoinos, a Persian land-measure.] An Egyptian measure of length equal to 60 stadia, or about 7½ miles.

Schiedam (skē-dam'), n. A name for Holland gin, from Schiedam, in Holland, which is the chief seat of the manufacture. 'Smuggled schiedam.' Jerrold.

Schiller-spar (shil'ēr-spār), n. [G. schillern, to change colour, and E. spar.] A genus of massive magnesio-siliceous spars, comprising four varieties, namely, common schiller-spar, bronzeite, hypersthene, and anthophyllite. It is of a pearly lustre and changeable hues.

Shilling (shil'ing), n. Same as Skilling (which see).

Schinus (skī'nus), n. [From Gr. schinos, the name of the mastic. A resinous juice exudes from this tree similar to mastic.] A genus of trees and shrubs, nat. order Anacardiaceae, natives of tropical America. They have small white flowers in terminal axillary panicles, and unequally pinnate leaves with a very long terminal leaflet. The leaves of some species are so filled with a resinous fluid that the least degree of unusual repletion of the tissue causes it to be discharged; thus some of them fill the air with fragrance after rain.

Schireman† (shir'man), n. A sheriff.

Schirrus (skir'rus), n. See SCIRRHUS.

Schism (sizm), n. [L. schisma; from Gr. schisma, 'rom schizo, to divide; akin to L. scindo, and to A. Sax. seccadan, G. scheiden, to separate, to part.] A split or division in a community; specifically and commonly, a division or separation in a church or denomination of Christians, occasioned by diversity of opinions; breach of unity among people of the same religious faith; the offence or sin of seeking to produce division in a church without just cause; as, to be guilty of schism. 'Schismes that were among our clergy.' Tyndall.

Schism is a rent or division in the church when it comes to the separating of congregations. Milton.

Schisma (skiz'ma), n. [Gr. See SCHISM.] In music, an interval equal to half a comma. See COMMA, 3.

Schismatic, Schismatical (siz-mat'ik, siz-mat'ik-al), a. Pertaining to schism; implying schism; partaking of the nature of schism; tending to schism; as, schismatical opinions or proposals.

How much soever a schismatical or heretical spirit, in the apostolic sense of the terms, may have contributed to the formation of the different sects which the Christian world is at present divided, no person who, in the spirit of candour and charity, adheres to that which, to the best of his judgment, is right, though in his opinion he should be mistaken, is, in the scriptural sense, either schismatic or heretic. Dr. G. Campbell.

Schismatic (siz-mat'ik), n. One who separates from an established church or religious faith on account of a diversity of opinions; one who partakes in a schism.

The schismatics united in a solemn league and covenant to alter the whole system of spiritual government. Swift.

Schist (shist), n. [From Gr. schistos, divided, divisible, from schizo, to split, to cleave.] A geological term applied to rocks which have a foliated structure and split in thin irregular plates, not by regular cleavage, as in the case of clay-slate, nor in laminae, as flagstones. It is properly confined to metamorphic or crystalline rocks consisting of layers of different minerals, as gneiss, mica-schist, hornblende-schist, chlorite-schist, &c.

Schistic (shist'ik), a. Same as Schistose.

Schistose, Schistous (shist'ōz, shist'us), a. Having the structure of schists; composed of uneven laminae of different minerals, as gneiss, mica-schist.

Schizandra (shī-zan'dra), n. [From Gr. schizo, to cleave, and aner, andros, a man—the stamens are split.] A genus of plants belonging to the nat. order Magnoliaceae.

S. coccinea is a handsome climbing shrub, with alternate membranous leaves, small crimson flowers, and red berries. It is a North American plant, and is found in woods in Georgia, Florida, and Carolina.

Schizandraceae (shī-zan-drā'sē-ē), n. pl. A small family of tropical eastern Asiatic and North American diclinous exogens, by some botanists regarded as a tribe of Magnoliaceae, distinguished from the true Magnoliaceae chiefly by their climbing habit, want of stipules, and unisexual flowers.

Schizanthus (shi-zan'thus), n. A genus of plants, nat. order Scrophulariaceae. The species are fine flowering annuals, having handsome violet, white, or crimson flowers and much-divided leaves. They are natives of Chili.

Schizodus (shiz'o-dus), n. An extinct genus of lamellibranchiate Mollusca, the fossil remains of which occur from the upper Silurian to the triassic rocks.

Schizopod (shiz'o-pod), n. One of the Schizopoda.

Schizopoda (shi-zop'o-da), n. pl. [Gr. schizo, to cleave, and pous, podos, a foot.] A tribe of long-tailed decapod crustaceans, the legs of which are accompanied by an external articulated branch as long as the limbs, which thus appear double in number. They are all of small size, and are marine. The Mysids, or opossum-shrimp, furnishes an example.

Schizopteris (shi-zop'tēr-is), n. [Gr. schizo, to cleave, and pteris, a fern.] A fossil genus of ferns belonging to the coal-measures, so named from their deeply-cleft palmated leaves. They are supposed to have been tropical climbing plants.

Schleichera (shli-kē'ra), n. [After Schleicher, a German botanist.] A genus of plants, nat. order Sapindaceae. S. trijuga, the best known (or only) species, is a tree with leaves abruptly pinnate, and small flowers disposed in spike-like racemes. It is a native of tropical Asia; in some parts of India its astringent bark, mixed with oil, is used as a remedy for the itch.

Schlich (shilik), n. [G.] Same as Stich.

Schmelze (shmel'tse), n. [G.] A kind of glass prepared in Bohemia, chiefly for the purpose of receiving the red colour imparted by the oxide of gold.

Schmidelia (shmi-dē'lī-a), n. [In honour of C. C. Schmidel, a professor of botany at Erlangen.] A genus of shrubs, nat. order Sapindaceae. The species are trees or shrubs, usually with trifoliate leaves and racemose white flowers. The fruit of S. serrata is eaten by the natives of Coromandel, and the root is employed as a cure for diarrhoea. They are natives of the tropics, especially those of the New World.

Schnapps, Schnaps (shnaps), n. [G. schnapps, a dram.] A dram of Holland gin or other ardent spirits.

Schneiderian Membrane (shni-dēr'i-an mem'brān), n. In anat. the lining membrane of the nostrils; the pituitary membrane; so named from Schneider, who first described it.

Schœnus (skē'nus), n. [From Gr. schoinos, a cord—made into cordage.] A genus of bog plants, nat. order Cyperaceae. The species have a wide geographical range. They are of grass-like habit, with the inflorescence in heads or crowded panicles. They are useful for making bands for tying up goods. S. nigricans (black bog-rush) is the only European species; it is a British plant, growing in bogs and wet moors.

Scholar (skol'ēr), n. [From L.L. scholaris, O.Fr. escolier, Mod. Fr. écolier, from L. schola, a school. See SCHOOL.] 1. One who attends a school; one who learns of a teacher; one who is under the tuition of a preceptor; a pupil; a disciple.—2. A man of letters; a learned person; a man eminent for erudition; a person of high attainments in science or literature.

He was a scholar and a ripe and good one. Shak.

3. One that learns anything; as, an apt scholar in the school of vice.—4. One acquainted with books only; a bookish theorist; a pedant. [Rare.]

To spend too much time in studies is sloth; to make judgement wholly by their rules, is the humour of a scholar. Bacon.

5. An undergraduate in English universities who belongs to the foundation of a college, and receives a portion of its revenues to furnish him with the means of prosecuting his studies during the academic curriculum.

Scholarship† (sko-lar'i-ty), n. Scholarship. B. Jonson.

Scholarly (skol'ēr-lī), a. Like a scholar; becoming a scholar or man of learning.

His Latin is much more scholarly than that of the generality of the monkish chroniclers of his time. Craik.

Scholarly† (skol'ēr-lī), adv. In the manner of a scholar; as becomes a scholar. 'Speak scholarly and wisely.' Shak.

Scholarship (skol'ér-ship), n. 1. The character and qualities of a scholar; attainments in science or literature; erudition; learning. 'A man of my master's understanding and great scholarship, who had a book of his own in print.' Pope.—2. Education; teaching.

This place should be school and university, not needing a remove to any other house of scholarship. Milton.

3. An exhibition or maintenance for a scholar at some educational institution; foundation for the support of a student.

A scholarship not half maintains, And college rules are heavy chains. Warton.

Scholastic (skô-las'tik), a. [L. scholasticus].

1. Pertaining to or suiting a scholar, school, or schools; like or characteristic of a scholar; as, scholastic manners; scholastic learning. 2. Pertaining to or characteristic of the schools or schoolmen of the middle ages; relating to the medieval philosophers and divines who adopted the system of Aristotle, and spent much time on points of nice and abstract speculation.

The Aristotelian philosophy, even in the hands of the master, was like a barren tree, that conceals its want of fruit by profusion of leaves. But the scholastic ontology was much worse. What could be more trifling than disquisitions about the nature of angels, their modes of operation, their means of conversing? Hallam.

Hence—3. Characterized by excessive subtlety or needlessly minute subdivisions; pedantic; formal. 'A matter of conscience, and not a scholastic nicety.' Stillingfleet.

Scholastic (skô-las'tik), n. One who adheres to the method or subtleties of the schools or schoolmen of the middle ages.

The scholastics did not understand Aristotle, whose original writings they could not read; but his name was received with implicit faith. Hallam.

Scholastic† (skô-las'tik-al), a. Same as Scholastic. 'The most strict and scholastic sense of the word.' Barrow.

Scholastically (skô-las'tik-al-ly), adv. In a scholastic manner; according to the niceties or method of the metaphysical schools of the middle ages. 'Moralists or casuists that treat scholastically of justice.' South.

Scholasticism (skô-las'ti-sizm), n. The system of philosophy taught by the schoolmen or philosophers of the middle ages. See SCHOOLMAN.

Scholast (skô-li-ast), n. [Gr. scholastês. See SCHOLIUM.] One who makes scholia; a commentator; an annotator; especially an ancient grammarian who annotated the classics. 'Quotations from Talmudists and scholasts.' Macaulay.

The title of this saty in some ancient manuscripts was the reproach of idleness, though in others of the scholasts 'tis inscribed against the luxury of the rich. Dryden.

Scholastic (skô-li-as'tik), a. Pertaining to a scholast or his pursuits. Swift.

Scholiast† (skô-li-az), v.t. pret. & pp. scholiazied; pp. scholiazing. To write scholia or notes on an author's works. [Rare.]

He thinks to scholiaz upon the gospel. Milton.

Scholical† (skôlik'al), a. Scholastic. Sir M. Hales.

Scholion (skô-li-on), n. Same as Scholium. Spenser.

Scholium (skô-li-um), n. E. pl. Scholiums (skô-li-umz), L. pl. Scholia (skô-li-a). [Gr. scholion, from scholê, leisure, lucubration.]

1. A marginal note, annotation, or remark; an explanatory comment; specifically, an explanatory remark annexed to the Latin and Greek authors by the early grammarians.—2. In geom. a remark or comment upon one or more preceding propositions, tending to show their use, connection, limitations, or the manner of their application.

Scholy† (skô-li), n. A scholium. 'Without scholy or gloss.' Hooker.

Scholyt† (skô-li), v.t. To write comments. The preacher should want a text, whereupon to scholyt. Hooker.

School (skôl), n. [A. Sax. scôl, O.E. scôle, O.Fr. escole, from L. schola, from Gr. scholê, leisure, that in which leisure is employed, discussion, philosophy, a place where spare time is employed, a school.] 1. A place or house in which persons are instructed in arts, science, languages, or any species of learning; an institution for learning; an educational establishment; a school-room. In modern usage the term is applied to any place or establishment of education, as day schools, grammar schools, academies, colleges, universities, &c.; but it is generally restricted to places in which elementary instruction is imparted to the young.—2. The collective body of pupils in any place of instruction, and under the direction of one or more teachers; as, to teach a school; to have a large school.—3. One of the seminaries founded in the middle ages for teaching logic, metaphysics, and theology, and which were characterized by academical disputations and subtleties of reasoning.

Philosophy was no longer confined to the schools and to prelections. J. D. Morell.

4. A session of an institution of instruction; exercises of instruction; school work.

How now, Sir Hugh? no school to-day? Shak.

5. A large room or hall in English universities where the examinations for degrees and honours take place.—6. The disciples or followers of a teacher; those who hold a common doctrine or accept the same teachings or principles; a sect or denomination in philosophy, theology, science, art, &c.; the system of doctrine as delivered by particular teachers; as, the Socratic school; the painters of the Italian school; the musicians of the German school.

Let no man be less confident in his faith concerning the great blessings God designs in these divine mysteries by reason of any difference in the several schools of Christians. Jer. Taylor.

7. A system or state of matters prevalent at a certain time; method or cast of thought; system of training generally.

He was a lover of the good old school, Who still become more constant as they cool. Byron.

8. Any place of discipline, improvement, instruction, or training. 'The world, . . . best school of best experience.' Milton.

Ye prim adepts in scandal's school, Who rail by precept and detract by rule. Sheridan.

—Board school, a district school carried on under the management of a specially elected board, according to the English educational system dating from 1870, or that of Scotland dating from 1872. See SCHOOL-BOARD.—Common school, in the United States, a primary or elementary school, supported by a general rate.—High school, a school in which a superior education can be obtained; sometimes the chief public school in a town.—Normal school. See NORMAL.—Parochial schools, or parish schools, in Scotland, public schools formerly established by law, one at least in each parish, for the purpose of furnishing a cheap education for the people. Such schools were taken over by the school-boards after 1872.—Public school, a school supported by public funds; a board school. In England this name is distinctively given to a certain number of schools, such as Eton, Winchester, Westminster, Harrow, Rugby, Shrewsbury, &c., all of which give a classical education, and are frequented by children of persons of rank and wealth.

The emulation of school-fellows often puts life and industry into young lads. Locke.

School-girl (skôl'gêrl), n. A girl belonging to a school.

School-house (skôl'hous), n. 1. A house appropriated for use as a school.—2. A school-master's or schoolmistress' dwelling-house.

Schooling (skôl'ing), n. 1. Instruction in school; tuition.

To him, and all of us, the expressly appointed schoolmasters and schoolings are as nothing. Carlyle.

2. Compensation for instruction; price or reward paid to an instructor for teaching pupils.—3. Reproof; reprimand.

You shall go with me, I have some private schooling for you both. Shak.

School-inspector (skôl'in-spek-têr), n. An official appointed by a government to examine schools and determine whether the education conveyed in them is satisfactory.

School-ma'am (skôl'mâm), n. A schoolmistress. [New England.]

Schoolmaid (skôl'mâd), n. A girl at school. Shak.

Schoolman (skôl'mân), n. A man versed in the niceties of academical disputation, or of school divinity. The schoolmen were philosophers and divines of the middle ages who adopted the principles of Aristotle, and spent much time on points of nice and abstract speculation. They were so called because they taught originally in the schools of divinity established by Charlemagne.

Unlearn'd, he knew no schoolman's subtle art. Pope.

Schoolmaster (skôl'mas-têr), n. 1. The man who presides over and teaches a school; a teacher, instructor, or preceptor of a school.

Adrian VI. was sometime schoolmaster to Charles V. Knolles.

2. One who or that which disciplines, instructs, and leads.

The law was our schoolmaster to bring us unto Christ. Gal. iii. 24.

—The schoolmaster abroad, a phrase first used by Lord Brougham to express the general diffusion of education and of intelligence resulting from education.

Let the soldier be abroad if he will; he can do nothing in this age. There is another personage abroad—a person less interesting—in the eyes of some, perhaps, insignificant. The schoolmaster is abroad; and I trust to him, armed with his primer, against the soldier in full military array. Brougham.

Schoolmate (skôl'mât), n. One of either sex who attends the same school.

Schoolmistress (skôl'mis-tres), n. 1. The mistress of a school; a female who governs and teaches a school.—2. She who or that which teaches. 'Nature, that exact schoolmistress.' Dryden.

School-room (skôl'rôm), n. A room for teaching.

School-teaching (skôl'têch-ing), n. The business of instruction in a school.

School-theology (skôl'thê-ol-o-jî), n. Scholastic divinity.

Schooner (skô'nêr), n. [It seems to have been proved beyond controversy that the name, like the vessel itself, is of American origin, being from a New England word soon, to skim or skip upon the water, to make ducks and drakes. The first vessel of the kind is said to have been built at Gloucester, Mass., by Captain Andrew Robinson, about 1713; and the name was given to it from the following circumstance:—Captain R. had constructed a vessel, which he masted and rigged in the manner that schooners now are, and on her going off the stocks into the water a bystander cried out, 'O, how she soons!' R. instantly replied, 'A schooner let her be,' and from that time this class of vessels has gone by that name. The name appears to have been originally spelled scowner, and to have been altered from an idea that the word was Dutch and derived from schoon, G. schön, beautiful. Soon may be the A. Sax. scünian, to shun.] 1. A vessel with two masts, and her chief sails fore-and-aft sails, her mainsail and foresail being suspended by a gaff, like a sloop's mainsail, and stretched below by a boom. A fore-and-aft schooner has either all her sails fore-and-aft sails, or she may have a square-sail which can be set when required on the foremast. A top-sail schooner carries a square foretop-sail, and often likewise a topgallant-sail and royal. Some schooners have three masts, but they have no tops. No kind of sailing-vessel is swifter than the schooner; and this rig is therefore very often used for yachts. 2. A tall glass used for lager-beer or ale, and containing about double the quantity of an ordinary tumbler.

Topsail Schooner.

Schorist (shô'rist), n. A name formerly given to the more advanced students in German Protestant universities who made fags of the younger students. See PENNAL.

Schorl, Shorl (shorl), n. [G. schörl, Sw. skörl, perhaps from skör, Dan. skör, brittle.] A mineral usually occurring in the sparry cavities and veins of the granitic rocks, and often found embedded in felspar and quartz. It is a prismatic, longitudinally-striated mineral, of a pitchy lustre and colour, brittle texture, and is capable of being rendered electric by heat or friction. Known also as Black Tourmaline.—Blue schorl, a variety of hayne. —Red and titanic schorl, names of rutile. —Violet schorl, axinite. —White schorl, albite. —Schorl rock, an aggregate of schorl and quartz. Sir C. Lyell.

Schorlaceous (shor-lä'shus), a. Schorlous.

Schorlite (shor'līt), n. Same as Pycnite.

Schorlous (shor'lūs), a. Pertaining to or containing schorl; possessing the properties of schorl.—Schorlous topaz. Same as Schorlite.

Schorly (shor'lī), a. Relating to or containing schorl.—Schorly granite, a granite consisting of schorl, quartz, felspar, and mica. Sir C. Lyell.

Schottish, Schottische (shot-tish'), n. [G. schottische, Scottish.] A dance performed by a lady and gentleman, resembling a polka; also, the music suited for such a dance; it is $\frac{2}{4}$ time.

Schrode (skröd), n. Same as Escrod and Serode.

Schuchint (skuch'in), n. An escutcheon; a shield; a device on a shield. Spenser.

Schweinfurth-green (shwīnfurt-grēn), n. A beautiful and velvety green, highly poisonous pigment, prepared by boiling together solutions of arsenious acid and acetate of copper: so called from Schweinfurth in Bavaria, where it was first made.

Sciadopitys (si-a-dop'it-is), n. [G. skias, skiadōs, a canopy, and pitys, a pine-tree.] A genus of conifers, known as the umbrella pine, introduced into our gardens from Japan, where it has been cultivated from time immemorial round the temples. The trunk rises to a height of 100 to 150 feet, and the habit is pyramidal. It is evergreen and highly ornamental.

Sciæna (si-ē'na), n. A genus of fishes, the type of the family Sciænidae.

Sciænidae (si-ē'ni-dē), n. pl. [G. skiaina, an umber, a grayling, and eidos, resemblance.] A family of acanthopterous fishes, the type of which is the genus Sciæna. They are closely related to the Perches, but both the vomer and palatines are without teeth, the bones of the cranium and face are generally cavernous, and form a muzzle more or less protruding. Only two species are reckoned as British, the maigre and the bearded umberina, both excellent for the table, as are many others of the family. Some members of the family possess a remarkable power of emitting sounds, as the maigre and drum-fish (which see). The Sciænidae are divided into many genera, and are widely distributed.

Sciænurus (si-ē'nūrus), n. [G. skiaina, an umber, a grayling, and oura, a tail.] A genus of fossil fishes, representing the perch and other allied forms. Its remains are very common in the London clay of the Isle of Sheppey.

Sciagraph (si'a-graf), n. [See SCIAGRAPHY.] The section of a building to show its inside.

Sciagraphic, Sciagraphical (si-a-graf'ik, si-a-graf'ik-al), a. Pertaining to sciagraphy.

Sciagraphically (si-a-graf'ik-al-lī), adv. In a sciagraphical manner.

Sciagraphy (si-ag'rāf'ia), n. [G. skiagraphia—skia, a shadow, and graphō, to describe.]

1. The act or art of correctly delineating shadows in drawing; the art of sketching objects with correct shading. — 2. In arch. the profile or section of a building to exhibit its interior structure; a sciagraph. — 3. In astron. the art of finding the hour of the day or night by the shadows of objects, caused by the sun, moon, or stars; the art of dialling.

Sciachachy (si-am'ak-i), n. See SCIOMACHY.
Sciatheric, Sciatheric (si-a-thē'rik, si-a-thē'rik-al), a. [G. skiathēras, a sun-dial, from skia, a shadow, and thēra, a catching.] Belonging to a sun-dial. Also written Sciathoric.

Sciatherically (si-a-thē'rik-al-lī), adv. In a sciatheric manner.

Sciatic (si-at'ik), n. Same as Sciatica.

Sciatic, Sciatical (si-at'ik, si-at'ik-al), a. 1. Pertaining to the hip; as, the sciatic artery or nerve. — 2. Affecting the hip; as, sciatic pains.

Sciatica (si-at'ik-a), n. [L. sciatica, from G. ischiadikos, from ischias, a pain in the hips, from ischion, the hip.] Neuralgia of the sciatic nerve. It is one of the most obstinate forms of neuralgia, and if protracted produces emaciation of the limb affected, with weakness, and a more or less permanent flexion. It is a frequent complication of gout, but is most commonly due to exposure to wet and cold.

Sciatically (si-at'ik-al-lī), adv. With or by means of sciatica.

Science (si'ens), n. [Fr. science, from L. scientia, knowledge, from scio, to know.]

1. Knowledge; comprehension or understanding of the truths or facts of any subject. 'Shakespeare's deep and accurate science in mental philosophy.' Coleridge.

God's prescience or foresight of any action of mine, or rather his science or sight from all eternity, lays no necessity on anything to come to pass. Hammond.

2. That wide field of mental activity which is concerned in the deducing of general laws or principles from observation of phenomena; truth or knowledge ascertained by observation, experiment, and induction; knowledge co-ordinated, arranged, and systematized; hence, a science is knowledge regarding any one department of mind or matter co-ordinated, arranged, and systematized; as, the science of botany, of astronomy, of metaphysics; mental science.—Applied science is a science when its laws are employed and exemplified in dealing with concrete phenomena, as opposed to pure science, as mathematics, when it treats of laws or general statements apart from particular instances. The term pure science is also applied to a science built on self-evident truths, and thus comprehends mathematical science as opposed to natural or physical science, which rests on observation and experiment.—Natural science is that branch of science which investigates the nature and properties of material objects, and the phenomena of nature. See under NATURAL.—Physical science, a term used in much the same sense as natural science, or as equivalent to physics (which see).—Moral science is that which treats of all mental phenomena, or, in a narrower sense, the same as moral philosophy or ethics.—The seven sciences of antiquity were grammar, logic, rhetoric, arithmetic, geometry, music, and astronomy.

Good sense, which only is the gift of Heaven, Although no science, fairly worth the seven. Pope.
Science deals with phenomena. By his faculties of perception, comparison, and generalization, man discovers the sequences, uniformities, co-relations, and differences of these phenomena, and groups them into so-called 'laws of nature.' This is the magnificent, unending work of science. Fraser's Mag.

Since all phenomena which have been sufficiently examined are found to take place with regularity, each having certain fixed conditions, positive and negative, on the occurrence of which it invariably happens, mankind have been able to ascertain . . . the conditions of the occurrence of many phenomena; and the progress of science mainly consists in ascertaining these conditions. J. S. Mill.

3. Art derived from precepts or built on principles; skill resulting from training; special, exceptional, or pre-eminent skill.

Nothing but his science, coolness, and great strength in the saddle could often have saved him from some terrible accident. Lawrence.

—The science, the art of boxing; pugilism. [Slang.]

Up to that time he had never been aware that he had the least notion of the science. Dickens.

4. † An object of study; a branch of knowledge.

To instruct her fully in those sciences, Whereof I know she is not ignorant. Shak.

—Art, Science. See under ART.

Science (si'ens), v. t. To cause to become versed in science; to instruct; to make skilled. [Rare.]

Deep science in the mazy lore Of mad philosophy. P. Francis.

Scient (si'ent), a. [L. sciens, scientis, ppr. of scio, to know.] Skilful; knowing.

Scienter (si-en'ter), adv. [L.] In law, knowingly; wilfully.

Sciential (si-en'shal), a. Pertaining to science; producing science or knowledge. 'Sciential rules.' Milton.

Scientific (si-en-tif'ik), a. [Fr. scientifique; L. scientia, knowledge, and facio, to make.]

1. Pertaining to or used in science; as, scientific nomenclature; a scientific instrument. 2. Evincing or endowed with a knowledge of science; containing or treating of science; well versed in science; as, a scientific physician; a scientific work.

Bossuet is as scientific in the structure of his sentences. Landor.

3. According to the rules or principles of science; as, a scientific arrangement of fossils.

Scientific (si-en-tif'ik-al), a. Scientific.

'All kind of scientific knowledge.' Howell.

Scientifically (si-en-tif'ik-al-lī), adv. In a scientific manner; according to the rules or principles of science.

It is easier to believe, than to be scientifically instructed. Locke.

Scientism (si'ent-izm), n. The views or practices of scientists.

Mr. Harrison's earnest and eloquent plea against the exclusive 'scientism' which, because it cannot find certain entities along its line of investigation, asserts loudly as they are either non-existent or 'unknowable,' is strong. Nineteenth Century.

Scientist (si'ent-ist), n. A person versed in or devoted to science; a scientific man; a savant.

For many years it has been a query whether the electric current might not be brought under man's control, as to take the place of steam as a motor for machinery, and success has at last crowned the persevering efforts of scientists. Nature.

Scilicet (sī-lī-set), [L.] To wit; videlicet; namely; abbreviated to Scil. or Sc.

Scilla (sī'lā), n. [From Gr. skyllō, to injure—roots poisonous.] A genus of bulbous stemmed plants, mostly natives of Europe, belonging to the nat. order Liliaceæ. See SQUILL.

ch, chain; ch, Sc. loch; g, go; j, job;

h, Fr. ton; ng, sing; TH, then; th, thin;

w, wig; wh, whig; zh, azure.—See KEY.

Scillitine (sil'ti-tin), n. The active ingredient of the squill, or the bulb of the Scilla maritima, to which its medical properties are referable. Investigations have not yet determined whether it is to be classed with the resins, the alkaloids, or the bitter principles.

Scimitar, Scimeter (sim'i-tér), n. [O Fr. cimitière, lt. scimitarra, from Per. shemshir, shimshir.] An oriental sword, the blade of which is single-edged, short, curved, and broadest at the point-end. Also written Cimeter.

Scincidae (sin'si-dē), n. pl. A large and widely distributed family of lacertilians, of which the genus Scincus, or skink, is the type. Some are completely snake-like, whilst others possess a single pair of limbs, and others again have the normal two pairs of limbs in a well-developed condition. The blind-worm (Anguis fragilis) is an example of the snake-like forms of this group. See BLIND-WORM, SKINK.

Scincoid (sin'koid), n. One of the Scincidae; a scincoidian.

Scincoid (sin'koid), a. Of, pertaining to, or resembling the Scincidae.

Scincoidae (sin-ko'i-dē), n. pl. Same as Scincidae.

Scincoidian (sin-ko'i-dian), n. and a. Same as Scincoid.

Scincus (sin'kus), n. [L.] The skink, a genus of lizards, forming the type of the family Scincidae. See SKINK.

Scink (singk), n. 1. A cast calf. [Provincial English.]—2. The skink.

Scinque (singk), n. The skink.

Scintilla (sin'til-la), n. [L.] A spark; a glimmer; the least particle; a trace; a tittle. 'Not a scintilla of evidence.' R. Choate.

Scintillant (sin'til-lant), a. [See SCINTILLATE.] Emitting sparks or fine igneous particles; sparkling.

The pointed rays,
That from black eyes scintillant blaze.

Mat. Green.

Scintillate (sin'til-lät), v. i. pret. scintillated; ppr. scintillating. [L. scintillo, scintillatum, from scintilla, a spark.] 1. To emit sparks or fine igneous particles.—2. To sparkle or twinkle, as the fixed stars.

Scintillation (sin'til-lä-shon), n. 1. The act of emitting sparks or igneous particles; the act of sparkling.—2. The term applied to the twinkling or tremulous motion of the light of the larger fixed stars.

Scintillous (sin'til-lus), a. Scintillant. [Rare.]

Scintilously (sin'til-lus-li), adv. In a scintillous or sparkling manner. Skelton.

Sciography (si-og'ra-fi), n. Same as Scia-graphy.

Sciollism (si'ol-izm), n. [See SCIOLIST.] Superficial knowledge.

We hear a great deal of the dangers of sciolism; but, given a mind of average capacity for assimilation and reflection, and the chances are that even a small modicum of scientific truth is likely to prove as good seed sown in a kindly soil.

Scotman newspaper.

Sciolist (si'ol-ist), n. [L. sciolus, a smatterer, dim. of scius, knowing, from scio, to know.] One who knows many things superficially; a smatterer.

These passages in that book, were enough to humble the presumption of our modern sciolists, if their pride were not as great as their ignorance.

Sir W. Temple.

Sciolistic (si-ol-ist'ik), a. Of or pertaining to sciolism or a sciolist; resembling a sciolist; superficial.

Sciolous (si'ol-us), a. Superficially or imperfectly knowing.

I could wish these sciolous zealotists had more judgement joined with their zeal.

Howell.

Sciomachy, Sciamachy (si-om'ak-i, si-am'ak-i), n. [Gr. skia, a shadow, and machē, a battle.] A fighting with a shadow; an imaginary or futile combat. 'To avoid this sciomachy, or imaginary combat with words.' Cowley. [Rare.]

Sciomanacy (si'o-man-si), n. [Gr. skia, a shadow, and manēia, divination.] Divination by shadows.

Scion (si'on), n. [Fr. scion, from L. sectio, sectionis, a cutting, from seco, to cut. Brachet, however, derives it from Fr. scier, to saw.] 1. A shoot or twig, especially for the purpose of being grafted upon some other tree, or for planting. 'Our scions, put in wild or savage stock.' Shak. 'Nor cared for seed or scion.' Tennyson. Hence—2. Fig. a descendant; an heir.

Scion of chiefs and monarchs, where art thou?

Byron.

Scioptic, Scioptrie (si-op'tik, si-op'trik), a.

[Gr. skia, a shadow, and optomai, to see.] Pertaining to the camera obscura, or to the art of exhibiting luminous images in a darkened room.—Scioptic ball, scioptrie ball, a perforated globe of wood containing the lens of a camera obscura, fitted with an appendage by means of which it is capable of being turned on its centre to a small extent in any direction, like the eye. It may be fixed at an aperture in a window shutter, and is used for producing images in a darkened room.

Sciopticon (si-op'ti-kon), n. A form of magic-lantern adapted for the exhibition of photographed objects.

Scioptics (si-op'tiks), n. The art or process of exhibiting luminous images, especially those of external objects, in a darkened room, by means of lenses, &c.

Sciote, Scot (si'ot, si'ot), a. Of or belonging to Scio, an island of the Egean Sea, or its inhabitants.

Sciote, Scot (si'ot, si'ot), n. A native or inhabitant of Scio.

Sciotheric (si-ō-ther'ik), a. [See SCIATHERIC.]

Pertaining to sun-dials.—Sciotheric telescope, an instrument consisting of a horizontal dial with a telescope adjusted to it, for determining the time, whether of day or night, by means of shadows.

Scire facias (si-rē fā'shi-as), n. [L.] In law, a writ to enforce the execution of judgments, patents, or matters of record; or to vacate, quash, or annul them. It is often abbreviated to sci. fa.

Scirewyte (si-r'wit), n. The annual tax formerly paid to the sheriff for holding the assizes and county courts.

Scirocco (si-rok'ko), n. See SIROCCO.

Scirpus (sēr'pus), n. [L., a rush.] An extensive genus of hardy plants, belonging to the Cyperaceæ, known in Britain by the name of club-rush or bulrush, having a wide geographical distribution, and growing in moist places or by rivers. S. tuberosus is the water-chestnut of the Chinese. Several species, especially the S. lacustris or bulrush, are used for mats, chair-bottoms, &c.

Scirrroid (skir'roid), a. [Gr. skirrhos, scirrhus, and eidos, form.] Resembling scirrhus. Dunglison.

Scirrhosis (skir-rō'sis), n. In med. a morbid induration; scirrhus.

Scirrhosity (skir-rof'i-ti), n. [See SCIRRHUS.] In med. the state of being scirrhus; also, a scirrhus or induration.

Scirrhus (skir'rus), a. Proceeding from or of the nature of scirrhus; resembling a scirrhus; indurated; knotty; as, scirrhus affections; scirrhus disease; a scirrhus tumour.

Scirrhus (skir'rus), n. [L. scirrhus; Gr. skirrhos, a hardened swelling or tumour.] In med. a hard tumour on any part of the body, usually proceeding from the induration of a gland, and often terminating in a cancer; the morbid condition of a gland which precedes cancer in the ulcerated state.

Scirrosity (skir-rof'i-ti). Same as Scirrhosity.

Sciscitation (sis-i-tä'shon), n. [L. sciscitation, sciscitationem, from sciscitor, to inquire or demand, from scisco, to know, to ascertain, from scio, to know.] The act of inquiring; inquiry; demand. Bp. Hall.

Scise (siz), v. i. [L. scindo, scissum, to cut.] To cut; to penetrate. 'The wicked steel scised deep in his right side.' Fairfax.

Scissars (siz'ers), n. pl. An old spelling of Scissors.

Scissel (sis'sel), n. [From L. scindo, to cut.] 1. The clippings of various metals, produced in several mechanical operations.—2. The remainder of a plate of metal after the planchets or circular blanks have been cut out for the purpose of coinage.

Scissible (sis'si-bl), a. [From L. scindo, scissum, to cut.] Capable of being cut or divided by a sharp instrument; as, scissible matter or bodies. Bacon.

Scissil (sis'sil), n. Same as Scissel.

Scissile (sis'sil), a. [L. scissilis, from scindo, to cut.] Capable of being cut or divided by a sharp instrument; scissible.

Scissile (sis'sil), n. Same as Scissel.

Scission (si'zhon), n. [Fr. from L. scissio, scissionis, from scindo, to cut.] The act of cutting or dividing by an edged instrument; the state of being cut; division; split.

Things ripen towards downright incompatibility, and what is called scission.

Carlyle.

Scissor (siz'er), v. t. To cut with scissors; to prepare with the help of scissors. Mas-singer.

Scissor-bill (siz'er-bil), n. Rhynchops, a genus of aquatic birds. See RHYNCHOPS, SKIMMER.

Scissors (siz'erz), n. pl. [L. scissor, one who cuts or divides, from scindo, scissum, to cut or divide; akin to Gr. schizo, to cut; G. scheiden, to separate, E. to shed.] A cutting instrument resembling shears, but smaller, consisting of two cutting blades movable on a pin in the centre, by which they are fastened, and which cut from opposite sides against an object placed between them. There are a number of varieties of construction specially adapted for cutting fabrics, trimming plants, &c., and for surgical and anatomical purposes. The instrument is often spoken of as a pair of scissors. (See under PAIR.) Formerly written also Scissars, Cizars, and Cizors.

Scissor-tail (siz'er-täl), n. A South American bird, the Milvulus forficatus or tyrannus, and belonging to the fly-catchers. It has a forked tail, terminated by two long feathers. When on the wing it has the power of turning in the air very quickly, and in so doing opens and shuts its tail just like a pair of scissors. It is about 14 inches in length, including the tail, which measures about 10. Though the dimensions of the bird are thus really small, it is very courageous, and is frequently seen to attack and defeat birds that are far superior in size and bodily strength. It is called also the Fork-tailed Flycatcher.

Scissor-tail (Milvulus forficatus or tyrannus).

Scissure (si'zhür), n. [L. scissura, from scindo, to cut.] A longitudinal opening in a body, made by cutting; a cleft; a rent; a fissure. 'The scissures and fissures of an earthquake.' Dr. H. More.

Scitamineæ, Scitamineæ (si-ta-min'ē-ē, si'tam-i-na'se-ē), n. pl. A large order or group of monocotyledonous plants comprising the three orders or tribes of Musaceæ, Marantaceæ, and Zingiberaceæ.

Scitamineous (si-ta-min'ē-us), a. [L. scitamentum, a dainty, a delicacy.] Belonging to the Scitamineæ.

Sciuridae (si-ür'i-dē), n. pl. A family of rodents, comprising the true squirrels, the flying squirrels, and the marmots. See SQUIRREL.

Sciurine (si-ür'in), a. [L. sciurus, a squirrel.] Having the characters of the squirrel tribe.

Sciuromorpha (si-ürō-mor'fi-a), n. pl. [Gr. skiouros, a squirrel, and morphē, form.] A name given to a group of rodents, including the squirrel, beaver, &c.

Sciuropterus (si-ür-op'tér-us), n. [Gr. skiouros, a squirrel, and pteron, a wing.] A genus of flying-squirrels, allied to Pteromys. The species are found in Northern Asia and North America. See PTEROMYS.

Sciurus (si-ür'rus), n. [L. sciurus, from Gr. skiouros, a squirrel, skia, a shade, and oura, a tail.] The squirrel, a genus of rodent mammals. See SQUIRREL.

Sclate (sklät), n. A slate. [Scotch.]

Sclandre, n. [Fr. esclandre, slander, scandal.] Slander. Chaucer.

Sclav, Slave (sklav), n. A member of the Slavonic family of peoples. See SLAV.

Slavonian, Slavonic (skla-vō'ni-an, skla-von'ik), a. Pertaining to the Slaves or Slaves or their language. See SLAV. Written also Slavonian and Slavonic.

Slendre, a. Slender. Chaucer.

Fäte, fär, fat, fäll; mē, met, hēr; pine, pin; nôte, not, möve; tübe, tub, bull;

oil, pound; ü, Sc. abune; y, Sc. fey.

Scleragogy (sklĕ-ra-go-jī), n. [Gr. sklēros, hard, and agōgē, a leading, driving, or training, from agō, to lead or drive.] Severe discipline or training; mortification; a severe handling of the body. Bp. Hackett. [Rare and obsolete.]

Scleranthaceæ (sklĕ-ran-tha'sē-ē), n. pl. [Gr. sklēros, hard, and anthos, a flower.] A small nat. order of plants allied to Caryophyllaceæ, in which they are often included. They are small herbs with opposite leaves without stipules, and axillary sessile hermaphrodite flowers. The deep calyx-tube bears the stamens at the top, hardening round the nut when in fruit. They are natives of barren fields in Europe, Asia, and North America.

Scleranthus (sklĕ-ran'thus), n. Knaewel, a genus of plants belonging to the nat. order Scleranthaceæ. See KNÄWEL.

Sclerema (sklĕ-rē-ma), n. [Gr. sklēros, hard.] In med. same as Scleroma.

Sclerencephalia (sklĕ-rĕn-sē-fā'li-a), n. [Gr. sklēros, hard, and encephalos, the brain.] Induration or hardening of the brain.

Sclerenchyma (sklĕ-rĕn'ki-ma), n. [Gr. sklēros, hard, and enchyma, infusion.] The calcareous tissue of which a coral is composed.

Scleritine (sklĕ-rĕ-tin'it), n. [Gr. sklēros, hard, and ritinē, resin.] A black, hard, brittle mineral resin, nearly allied to amber, found in the coal formation in drops and pellets.

Scleriosis (sklĕ-rī'as-is), n. [Gr. sklēros, hard.] In med. any hard tumour or induration. Dunglison.

Sclerites (sklĕ-rīt), n. pl. [Gr. sklēros, hard.] The calcareous spicules which are scattered in the soft tissues of certain Actinozoa.

Sclerobase (sklĕ-rō-bās), n. The horny axis or stem of a coral.

Sclerobasic (sklĕ-rō-bās'ik), a. [Gr. sklēros, hard, and basis, a base.] Applied to a coral which is produced by the outer surface of the integuments in certain Actinozoa (e.g. red coral), and forms a solid axis which is invested by the soft parts of the animal. The sclerobasic corallum is in reality an exoskeleton, somewhat analogous to the shell of a crustacean, being a true tegumentary secretion. It is termed foot secretion by Dana. The sclerobasic corallum is produced by a compound organism only, and can be distinguished from a sclerodermic by being usually more or less smooth, and invariably devoid of the cups or receptacles for the separate polyps always present in the latter.

Scleroderm (sklĕ-rō-dĕrm), n. [Gr. sklēros, hard, and derma, skin.] One of a family of plectognathic (teleostean) fishes, comprehending those which have the skin rough or covered with hard scales. One species, the Balistes or file-fish, occasionally occurs in the British seas.

Scleroderma (sklĕ-rō-dĕr'ma), n. In med. induration of the cellular tissue.

Sclerodermic (sklĕ-rō-dĕr'mik), a. 1. Of or pertaining to a scleroderm.—2. Applied to the corallum which is deposited between the tissues of certain Actinozoa, being secreted apparently by the inner layer of the ectoderm, and is called tissue secretion by Dana. In the sclerodermic corallum each polyp has a complete skeleton of its own, and the entire coral may consist of such skeleton, or of several united by the calcareous matter of the cenosarc. See SCALEROBASE.

Sclerogen (sklĕ-rō-jen), n. [Gr. sklēros, hard, and gennao, to produce.] In bot. the matter of lignification which is deposited on the inner surface of the cells of plants, contributing to their thickness; lignin.

Sclerogenidæ (sklĕ-rō-jen'ī-dē), n. pl. [Gr. sklēros, hard, and gennas, a cheek.] A family of acanthopterygious teleostean fishes distinguished by having the cheeks malleated or defended by spines or scaly plates of hard matter. Called also Triglidæ. See MAILED-CHEEKS.

Scleroid (sklĕ-roid), a. [Gr. sklēros, hard, and eidos, appearance.] In bot. having a hard texture.

Scleroma (sklĕ-rō-ma), n. In med. induration of the cellular tissue. Dunglison.

Sclerometer (sklĕ-rom'et-ēr), n. [Gr. sklēros, hard, and metron, a measure.] An instrument for accurately determining the degree of hardness of a mineral.

Sclerophthalmia (sklĕ-rof-thal'mi-a), n. [Gr. sklēros, hard, and ophthalmos, the eye.] In med. (a) a small inflammatory tumour which exhibits itself near the free edge of the eyelids; a sty. (b) Cancer of the eye.

Sclerosis (sklĕ-rō'zīs), n. In med. induration of the cellular tissue. Dunglison.

Scleroskeleton (sklĕ-rō-skel-ē-ton), n. [Gr. sklēros, hard, and E. skeleton.] In anat. (a) a name given to bones developed in tendons, ligaments, &c., as in a turkey's leg. (b) The hardened or ossified fibrous and tendinous tissues that inclose organs. Owen.

Sclerostoma (sklĕ-rō'stō-ma), n. [Gr. sklēros, hard, stoma, the mouth.] A genus of parasitic worms belonging to the order Nematodea (thread-worms or round-worms), one species of which (S. duodenale) inhabits the small intestine in the human body. It varies in size from $\frac{1}{4}$ inch to $\frac{3}{4}$ inch, and the symptoms to which it gives rise are often of a serious character. It is common in Italy and in Egypt.

Sclerotall (sklĕ-rō'tal), a. A term applied to the ossified part of the eye-capsule of a fish, commonly existing in two pieces. Owen.

Sclerotic (sklĕ-rō'tik), a. [Gr. sklēros, hard, sclerotic, hardness.] Hard; firm; as, the sclerotic coat or tunic of the eye.

Sclerotic (sklĕ-rō'tik), n. 1. The firm white membrane which covers nearly the posterior four-fifths of the eye, its place in front being supplied by a transparent membrane called the cornea, which affords a passage to the light.—2. A medicine which hardens and consolidates the parts to which it is applied.

Sclerotitis (sklĕ-rō'tītis), n. Inflammation of the sclerotic coat.

Scot (skōt), v. t. [Armor. scot, the shoulder; whence scotzay, to shoulder up, to prop, to support; W. ysgwydd, a shoulder; ysgwyddaw, to shoulder.] To stop or block, as a wheel, by placing some obstacle, as a stone, to prevent its rolling; to scotch.

Scobby (skōb'ī), a. A familiar name for the common chaffinch.

Scobiform (skōb'ī-form), a. [L. scobs, scobis, saw-dust, and forma, form.] Having the form of or resembling saw-dust or raspings.

Scobina (skō-bī'na), n. [L., a rasp or file.] In bot. the immediate support to the spikelets of grasses.

Scobs (skōbz), n. [L. scobs, saw-dust, scrapings, raspings, from scabo, to scrape.] Raspings of ivory, hartshorn, metals, or other hard substances; dross of metals, &c.; saw-dust.

Scochon, † n. An escutcheon of arms. Chaucer.

Scoff (skof), v. i. [Icel. skopa, skeypa, to scoff, to mock; comp. D. skuffe, to deceive. See the noun.] To show insolent ridicule or mockery; to manifest contempt by derision; to utter contemptuous language; to mock; with at before the object.

They shall scoff at the kings. Hab. i. 10.
Truth from his lips prevail'd, with double sway,
And fools, who came to scoff, remain'd to pray. Goldsmith.

Scoff (skof), v. t. To treat with derision or scorn; to mock at; to ridicule. 'Scoffing his state.' Shak.

To scoff religion is ridiculously proud and immodest. Clarendon.

Scoff (skof), n. [Icel. skop, skaup, mockery, ridicule; O.H.G. scoph, O.Fris. schop, sport. See the verb.] 1. Expression of derision, ridicule, or mockery; expression of scorn or contempt; a jibe; a flout. 'With scoffs and scorn.' Shak.

I met with scoffs. I met with scorn.
From youth, and babe, and hoary hairs. Tennyson.

2. An object of scoffing or derision; a mark for derision.

The principles of liberty were the scoff of every grinning courtier, and anathema maranatha of every fawning dean. Macaulay.

Scoffer (skof'ēr), n. One who scoffs; one that mocks or derides; a scorner.

There shall come in the last days scoffers, walking after their own lusts, and saying, 'Where is the promise of his coming?' 2 Pet. iii. 3, 4.

Scoffery (skof'ēr-ī), n. The act of scoffing; mockery. Holinshead.

Scoffingly (skof'ing-li), adv. In a scoffing manner; in mockery or contempt; by way of derision.

Aristotle applied this hemistich scoffingly to the sycophants at Athens. W. Browne.

Scoke (skōk), n. Pokeweed. See POKE.

Scolae, † v. t. To attend school; to study. Chaucer.

Scold (skōld), v. i. [Sc. scald, L.G. and D. schelden, Dan. skjælde, G. schelten, to scold, to rail, to revile; allied to Icel. skjalla, to clash, to clatter; comp. also Icel. skellr, clang, crash; G. schelle, a bell, and Sw. skalla, to bark like a dog, to scold. Perhaps originally imitative of noise.] To find fault or rail with rude clamour; to brawl; to utter railing or harsh, rude, boisterous rebuke; to make use of abuse or vituperation; generally with at; as, to scold at a servant.

I had rather hear them scold than fight. Shak.
For gods, we are by Homer told,
Can in celestial language scold. Swift.

Scold (skōld), v. t. To chide with rudeness and ill-temper; to rate; to reprimand; to vituperate. 'She scolded her husband one day out of doors.' Howell.

Scold (skōld), n. 1. One who scolds; a scolder; especially, a rude, noisy, foul-mouthed woman; a railing virago.

Scolds answer foul-mouthed scolds. Swift.

2. A scolding; a brawl.

Scolder (skōld'ēr), n. One that scolds or rails. 'Scolders and sowers of discord.' Cranmer.

Scolding (skōld'ing), n. The act of one who scolds; railing or vituperative language; a rating.

The bitterest and loudest scolding is for the most part among those of the same street. South.

Scoldingly (skōld'ing-li), adv. In a scolding manner; like a scold.

Scolecida (skō-lĕ'sī-da), n. pl. [From Gr. skōlēx, an earthworm, a tape-worm.] Huxley's name for a provisional class of annulids, comprising the Rotifera, Turbellaria, Trematoda, Tæniada, Nematodea, Acanthocephala, and Gordiacea, and thus including the tape-worms, flukes, &c. The Scolecida are characterized by the possession of a water vascular system, consisting of a remarkable set of vessels which communicate with the exterior by one or more apertures situated upon the surface of the body, and branch out, more or less extensively, into its substance. No proper vascular apparatus is present, and the nervous system (when present) consists of one or two closely approximated ganglia.

Scolecte (skō-lĕ-sit), n. [Gr. skōlēx, a worm.] In mineral. see MESOTYPE.

Scolēx (skō'lĕks), n. pl. Scolices (skō'li-sēz), [Gr. skōlēx (pl. skōlēkes), a worm.] The larva of Scolecida; a tape-worm in its embryonic stage, formerly called a cystic worm.

Scoliosis (skō-lī-ō'sis), n. [Gr. skolios, crooked.] A distortion of the spine to one side.—Scoliosis brace, a brace for treating lateral curvature of the spine.

Scolite (skō'lit), n. [Gr. skolios, tortuous.] In geol. the name by which those tortuous tubes found in rocks of almost all ages, from the Cambrian period upwards, are known; supposed to be the burrows of certain annelids, or, possibly, of minute fossiliferous crustaceans. Written also Scolithus.

Scollop (skōl'op), n. 1. A kind of shell-fish with a pectinated shell. See SCALLOP.—2. An indentation or cut like those of a pectinated shell.

Scollop (skōl'op), v. t. To form or cut with scollops. See SCALLOP.

Scolopacidæ (skol-o-pas'ī-dē), n. pl. [L. scolopax, Gr. scolopax, a snipe, a woodcock, and eidos, resemblance.] A family of longirostral wading-birds, of which the genus Scolopax is the type; the snipe and wood-cock family. They have all a long, flexible, soft bill, peculiarly sensitive at the tip, so that it constitutes an organ of touch, and is useful as a probe in seeking their food—consisting of worms, slugs, &c.—in mud, soft earth, sand, &c.

Scolopax (skōl'op-paks), a. A genus of birds, of the order Grallatores, including the woodcock and snipe. See SCOLOPACIDÆ.

Scolopendra (skol-o-pen'dra), n. [Gr. skolopendra, a milliped.] A genus of articulate animals, of the order Cheilopoda, and class Myriapoda, destitute of wings. These animals have nearly as many feet on each side as there are segments in the body. There are several species. They inhabit the southern parts of Europe, and all the tropical portions of the globe, and their bite is venomous. See CHEILOPODA, CENTIPED.

Scolopendrium (skol-o-pen'dri-um), n. A genus of ferns. See HART'S-TONGUE.

Scolymus (skō'lī-mus), n. [Gr. skolymos, a kind of thistle.] A genus of smooth erect, thistle-like herbs belonging to the nat. order Compositæ, natives of the Mediterranean region. They have alternate rigid spiny leaves, and sessile terminal or lateral heads of yellow flowers. S. hispanicus is sometimes included in English lists by the name of golden-thistle. See GOLDEN-THISTLE.

Scolytus (skol'i-tus), n. A genus of small but very destructive coleopterous insects, belonging to the family Xylophagi or wood-eaters. They destroy immense numbers of trees, especially firs, pines, and elms, by piercing them for the sake of eating the inner bark.

Scomber (skom'bér), n. [Gr. skombros, the mackerel.] The mackerel, a genus of acanthopterygious fishes, the type of the family Scomberidae. See MACKEREL.

Scomberesocidae (skom'bér-é-sos'i-dé), n. pl. Lit. the mackerel-pikes, a family of teleostean fishes containing the saury-pike (Scomberesox saurus) and others.

Scomberesox (skom'bér-é-soks), n. A genus of fishes containing the saury-pike. See SAURY-PIKE.

Scomberidae (skom-ber'i-dé), n. pl. [Gr. skombros, the mackerel, and eidós, resemblance.] A family of acanthopterygian fishes, of which the common mackerel may be regarded as a type. The tunny, sword-fish, dory, and boar-fish also belong to this group, which contains a multitude of species and many genera.

Scomberoid (skom'bér-oid), n. A fish of the family Scomberidae.

Scomfish (skom'fish), v. t. [Corruption of discomfit.] To suffocate, as by noxious air, smoke, &c. [Scotch.]

My cousin, Mrs. Glass, has a brow house here, but a' thing is she poisoned wi' snuff that I am like to be scomfished whies. Sir W. Scott.

Scomfish (skom'fish), v. i. To be suffocated or stifled. [Scotch.]

Scomm† (skom), n. [L. scommma, from Gr. skómma, a scoff, a gibe, a taunt, from skóptō, to mock, to jeer.] 1. A flout; a jeer. 'The scommie of the orator.' Fotherby.—2. A buffoon. 'The scommie or buffoons of quality.' Sir R. L'Éstrange.

Sconce (skons), n. [O.E. sconcea, O.Fr. esconcea, a screen, a shelter, a sconce; from Med. L. absconsa (for absconsa candelā, a hidden or covered light), sconsa, a dark lantern, a sconce, from L. abscondā, abscondum, to hide. See ABSCOND.] 1. A cover; a shelter; a protection; as, specifically, (a) a screen or partition to cover or protect anything; a shed or hut for protection from weather; a covered stall. 'One that . . . must raise a sconce by the highest way and sell swiches.' Beau, & Fl. (b) A cover or protection for a light; a case or lantern for a candle; hence, also, the tube in an ordinary candlestick in which the candle is inserted; a fixed lantern or candlestick hanging or projecting from a wall. 'Tapers put into lanterns or sconces of several-coloured oiled paper that the wind might not annoy them.' Evelyn.

Golden sconces hang upon the wall. Dryden.

(c) A work for defence; a bulwark; a fort, as for the defence of a pass or river. [It is probable that the word received this specific sense from English or Scotch soldiers engaged in the Low Countries, Sweden, and Germany, through its resemblance in form and sense to D. schanz, G. schanze, Sw. skans, Dan. skansde, a redoubt, a fort, which are not unlikely derived from O.Fr. sconser, esconser, to hide—L. ex, and condo, to hide.]

They will learn you by rote where services were done; at such and such a sconce, at such a breach. Shak.

(d) A covering or protection for the head; a helmet; a head-piece. 'A sconce for my head.' Shak. (e) The head itself; the skull. 'To knock him about the sconce with a dirty shovel.' Shak. Hence, (1) brains; sense; judgment; discretion. 'Which their dull sconces cannot easily reach.' Dr. H. More. (2) A mulct; a fine. Comp. pol-tax. (3) The broad head or top of anything, as the brim around the circular tube of a candlestick into which the candle is inserted. 2. A fixed seat or shelf. North.—3. Score (skôr), n. [A. Sax. scor, a score, a notch, from sceran, to shear, to cut; Icel. skori, an incision, a tally, the number twenty; skora, to make an incision, to number by making notches in wood. Akin scar or scatur, share, shear, shire, shore, short.] 1. A notch or incision; especially, a notch or cut made on a tally for the purpose of keeping account of something: a mode of reckoning in former times when writing was less common.

Whereas, before, our forefathers had no other books but the score and the tally, thou hast caused printing to be used. Shak.

2. The number twenty, as being marked off by a special score or tally.

Score, when used for twenty, has been well and rationally accounted for by supposing that our unlearned ancestors, to avoid the embarrassment of large numbers, when they had made twice ten notches cut off the piece or tally containing them, and afterwards counted the scores or pieces cut off, and reckoned by the number of separated pieces, or by scores. Tooke.

Score was constantly used by archers to mean twenty yards; thus, a mark of twelve score meant a mark at the distance of 240 yards.—3. An account or reckoning kept by scores, marks, or otherwise; an account of dues.

E'en now the godlike Brutus views his score
Scroll'd on the bar-board, swinging with the door. Crabbe.

Hence, what is due; a debt.

They say he parted well, and paid his score. Shak.

4. An account or register of numbers generally; the number of points or runs made by players in certain games; as, he made a good score at cricket.—5. Account; reason; motive; sake.

Scorpioid, Scorpioidal (skôr'pi-oid, skôr'pi-oid-al), a. 1. Scorpion-like.—2. In bot. said of a peculiar twisted inflorescence, curved or circinate at the end, like the tail of a scorpion, as in the members of Boraginaceæ.

Scorpion (skôr'pi-on), n. [L. scorpio, scorpius, also scorpius, from Gr. skorpiôn, skorpius, scorpion.] 1. The name of any species of Scorio, a genus of pulmonary arachnids—order Arthrogastra or Pedipalpi. Scorpions have an elongated body, suddenly terminated by a long slender tail formed of six joints, the last of which terminates in an Scorpion (Scorpio aser).

arcuated and very acute sting, which effuses a venomous liquid. This sting gives rise to excruciating pain, but is unattended either with redness or swelling, except in the axillary or inguinal glands, when an extremity is affected. It is very seldom, if ever, fatal to man. The animal has four pairs of limbs borne by the thorax or chest-segments, and the maxillary palpi (organs of touch belonging to the maxillæ or lesser jaws) are largely developed, and constitute a formidable pair of nipping claws. With these claws they seize their insect prey, which is afterwards killed by the sting. The eyes, which are of the simple kind, number six, eight, or twelve. It was formerly believed that an oil, extracted from the scorpion, had the virtue of curing the sting of the animal. We find this belief referred to in the following passage:—

And though I once despaired of woman, now
I find they relish much of scorpions,
For both have stings, and both can hurt and cure too. Beau. & Fl.

It is also asserted that when the scorpion is surrounded by a circle of fire, and finds no means of escape from the action of the heat, it will sting itself. This is alluded to by various writers. Scorpions are found in the south of Europe, in Africa, in the East Indies, and in South America. The number of species is not accurately determined.—2. In Scip. a painful scourge; a kind of whip armed with points like a scorpion's tail.

My father hath chastised you with whips, but I will chastise you with scorpions. 1 Ki. xii. 11.

3. In astron. the eighth sign of the zodiac which the sun enters about Oct. 23.—4. An ancient military engine used chiefly in the defence of the walls of a town. It resembled the ballista in form, consisting of two beams bound together by ropes, from the middle of which rose a third beam, called the stylus, so disposed as to be pulled up and let down at pleasure; on the top of this were fastened iron hooks whereon a sling of iron or hemp was hung for throwing stones.

Scorpion-fish (skor'pi-on-fish), n. A fish of the genus Scorpena (which see); a hog-fish. Called also Sea-scorpion.

Scott.*—Scotch fir, the Pinus sylvestris.

It is the typical pine of Europe, especially of the northern and central parts, ranging from the Mediterranean to Scandinavia. It varies much in size, at high elevations being merely a stunted shrub, while in more favourable situations it attains the height of 100 feet. Besides furnishing excellent timber it yields valuable products, as turpentine, tar, resin, &c. Its varieties of timber are known as red, Norway, Riga, and Baltic pine. A variety growing native in Braemar has by some been raised into a distinct species under the specific name of Pinus horizontalis, Braemar or Speyside pine. Also called the Scotch Pine and Wild Pine. See PINE.—Scotch kale, green borecole, a variety of the cabbage, extensively cultivated in Scotland as a pot-herb.—Scotch mist, a colloquial term for a coarse, dense mist, like fine rain; or for a fine rain.—Scotch pebble, a name for varieties of agate, carnelian, and the like, originally derived from the cavities of amygdaloidal rocks in Scotland.—Scotch rose, a species of very thorny rose, Rosa spinosissima.—Scotch thistle, a kind of thistle regarded as the national emblem of Scotland, but the precise species to which the name properly belongs is not settled. Most authorities consider it to be the Onopordum Acanthium; others to be the Carduus Marianus; while some, with greater probability, refer it to the common Cnicus lanceolatus. The doubts have arisen from the figures on old coins and in paintings being intended to represent something like a thistle rather than any one in particular. See THISTLE.

Machine-gun (ma-shén-gun), n. A gun that is loaded and fired mechanically and can deliver a number of projectiles simultaneously or in rapid succession, having usually two or more separate barrels. The first machine-gun to come into prominence in warfare was the French mitrailleuse, which was employed in the Franco-German war. Another, the Gatling gun, first appeared in the United States and was used in the civil war. Other machine-guns now in use are the Hotchkiss, Nordenfeldt, Gardner, and Maxim. In the Gatling and Hotchkiss guns the barrels revolve, while in the others they remain fixed. The Maxim has only one barrel, while the others have from two to ten. The Gatling field-gun has ten barrels which revolve, and ten locks which not only revolve but have a backward and forward motion of their own, this motion effecting the loading and extraction of the fired cartridges. In the Hotchkiss the barrels revolve, but there is only one lock. While these both have the barrels arranged circularly the Gardner and Nordenfeldt have them side by side. In the Gatling, Gardner, and Hotchkiss the firing and extracting mechanism is made to work by turning a crank handle, in the Nordenfeldt the handle is moved backwards and forwards. The Maxim gun is self-acting, the recoil being utilized to work the loading, firing, and extracting mechanism. The first cartridge having been inserted and fired by hand, the cartridges, carried upon a canvas band, are brought into position automatically, and the firing continues until the supply is exhausted or the gunner throws the mechanism out of gear. The gun can fire 650 rounds per minute.

Sakieh, Sakia (sak'ie, sak'ia), n. [Ar.] A modification of the Persian wheel used in Egypt for raising water for irrigation purposes. It consists essentially of a vertical wheel to which earthen pots are attached on projecting spokes, a second vertical wheel on the same axis with cogs, and a large horizontal cogged wheel, which gears with the other cogged wheel. The large wheel, being turned by oxen or other draught animals, puts in motion the other two wheels, the one carrying the pitchers dipping into a well or a deep pit adjoining and supplied with water from a river. The pitchers are thus emptied into a tank at a higher level, whence the water is led off in a network of channels over the neighbouring fields. Instead of the pitchers being attached directly to the wheel, when the level of the water is very low they are attached to an endless rope. The construction of these machines is usually very rude.

Salangane (salan-gän), n. [Of Eastern origin.] The bird that produces the edible nests of which the Chinese are so fond, a species of swift (Collocalia fucipaga). The nests seem to be formed of a kind of mucus secreted by special glands of the birds.

PRONOUNCING VOCABULARY

OF

MODERN GEOGRAPHICAL NAMES.

NOTES ON THE SPELLING AND PRONUNCIATION.

FOREIGN geographical names are spelled in English books either in the same manner as they are spelled in the language of the country to which they belong, or phonetically in accordance with the prevailing sounds of the letters of the English alphabet. The first method can, of course, be adopted only for names belonging to countries in which the Roman alphabet is used with or without diacritic marks. In the following notes on the pronunciation of foreign names the sounds indicated as those corresponding to the letters of foreign alphabets are explained, where necessary, by the key-line at the foot of the page.

In that key-line it will be seen that six signs are used to represent un-English sounds. These must be learned by the ear from those who are able to render them accurately, but it may be mentioned that the French sound heard long in vê and short in bû is like the sound of u in the Scotch word abune; that that heard long in bleû and short in neûf has some resemblance to the sound of e in her; that the sound represented by ñ (as in the French on) is produced by emitting voice through the mouth and nose at the same time, and is accordingly not a pure nasal (like the English ng in sing) but a semi-nasal; and that the ch in the German nacht is a strongly aspirated guttural like ch in the Scotch word loch. Strictly speaking two sounds are represented in German by ch, or by g, which is sometimes its equivalent. After the vowels a, o, u it is a guttural as in the Scotch loch, but after the other vowels and after consonants it is produced by the emission of breath between the point of the tongue and the fore-part of the palate.

Even with these signs for un-English sounds it must be remembered that the sound indicated for the letters of foreign alphabets is very often only an approximation to the true pronunciation, as foreign languages have a great many shades of sound which can be acquired only by those who have familiarized themselves with these languages as they are actually spoken by the people, and which, besides, no Englishman would ever think of trying to reproduce in pronouncing foreign names while reading or speaking English. It will be observed that, as the key shows, y is always used with its consonantal or semi-vowel sound as in yes. Thus when it is stated that the Hungarian gy has the sound of dy, it is to be understood that at the end of a word that combination does not form a separate syllable, but goes to form one syllable with the preceding letters. The Hungarian prefix Nagy, for example, is pronounced in one syllable Nody, the d being followed by the consonant y with an effect closely resembling that of a very soft zh.

A. Some rules for the pronunciation of languages using the Roman alphabet.

VOWELS AND VOWEL DIGRAPHS.

a is usually sounded ä, but sometimes long sometimes short. In Hungarian it is sometimes like o in not.

ä in Swedish is sounded ö.

ä or ae is usually sounded like ä or e, in Flemish (and old Dutch) like ä.

ą in Polish is sounded like the French on.

aa in Danish is sounded as ö, in Dutch as ä.

ai and ay usually have each of the vowels sounded, the sound of ä being rapidly followed by that of ä. In German they are sounded like i in pine, in French mostly like ä.

ão in Portuguese is sounded as ouñ.

au is usually pronounced either with the sounds of the vowels separately, or as a diphthong like ou. In French it is pronounced like o in note.

e is usually sounded like ä or e in met. In Spanish it always has the latter sound. Very often it has an obscure sound as in the English golden. In French it is often mute.

e in Polish is sounded like the French ain (añ).

ě in Bohemian and Servian is sounded as ye or yä.

eau in French has the sound of o in note.

ei and ey, like ai and ay, usually have each of the vowels sounded separately, the sound of ä being rapidly followed by that of ä. In Dutch and German they have the sound of i. In French they are pronounced like ä or e.

eu is sounded in Dutch as in French, in German like oi, in other languages with the sounds of the vowels separately.

i is usually sounded like ä, or, when short, often like i.

ie in Dutch, German, and French is sounded like ä except where the letters belong to two syllables.

ij in Dutch has a sound like that of i in pine, but more open, that is, with less of the ä-sound at the close.

o is usually sounded like ö or o, in Danish and Norwegian sometimes like ö.

ö or oe is sounded in German, Danish, and Swedish like eu in French.

ø in Danish has a sound similar to ö, but somewhat closer.

ó in Polish is sounded like o in move.

oi is usually pronounced with the sounds of the separate vowels, in French it is like wa in war.

ou in French has the sound of ö, in Dutch and Norwegian that of ou.

u is usually sounded as ö or u; in French, as already mentioned, the sound is peculiar. In Danish, when short, it is sounded like ä; in Dutch, when short and followed by a consonant in the same syllable, like u; when long, like ü; in Welsh, without an accent mark, like i.

ü or ue in German is sounded like ü or ü.

û in Welsh is sounded like ä.

ui in Dutch is pronounced like oi in oil.

y is usually sounded like ä; in Danish, Swedish, and Polish like the French u. In old Dutch it is used where the digraph ij is used in modern orthography. In Welsh, without an accent mark, it has the sound of u, except at the end of a word when it sounds like i.

ŷ in Welsh has the sound of e in me (like the Welsh û).

CONSONANTS AND CONSONANTAL DIGRAPHS.

Most of the consonants have the same sound in the languages of the European continent using the Roman alphabet as they have in English, but the following peculiarities are to be noted:—

b at the end of a word is often sounded in German like p. In Spanish it is pronounced with very feeble contact of the lips so as to be softened almost to a v-sound.

c before another consonant and before the vowels a, o, u is usually sounded like k; in French, Danish, Swedish, and Portuguese it is sounded in other situations like s, in Italian like ch in chain, in Spanish like th in thin,

Fäte, fär, fat, fall;
j, job; y, yes;

mē, met, hēr, golden;
th, then; th, thin;

pine, pin;
zh, azure.

nôte, not, möve;
French, vûe, bût;

tub, bull;
bleû, neûf;

oil, pound;
ñ, on.

ch, chain; g, go;
German, ch, nacht.

in German like ts. In Italian where another vowel follows ci (as well as gi or sci) the i is not sounded. In Spanish America c is usually pronounced as s in those cases in which in Spain it is pronounced th. In Bohemian and Polish it is always sounded like ts, and in Welsh always like k.

c is used in French and Portuguese to indicate the s-sound of c before the vowels a, o, and u.

ch in Dutch, Polish, and Bohemian, as well as in German, has the sound of ch; in Italian it has the sound of k; in French (except in some words derived from the Greek, in which it is sounded like k) that of sh.

cs in Hungarian has the sound of ch in chain.

cz in Polish has the sound of ch in chain, in Hungarian that of ts.

d at the end of a word in German and Dutch is often sounded like t. In Spanish and Danish between two vowels, and after a vowel at the end of a word, it is softened to the sound of th, and in the latter language the same sound is given to it even when doubled. Strictly speaking the Spanish d is a dental d, being sounded by placing the tip of the tongue close to the lower edge of the upper front teeth. At the beginning of a sentence and when the d is preceded by another consonant, whether in the same word or another, the tongue is more firmly pressed against the teeth and a sound like that of the English d is produced, but in other cases the contact is so slight as to produce a sound almost exactly like that of th. At the end of words even this sound is almost inaudible. When d comes after l, n, r in Danish it is not sounded at all, and it is still more frequently silent in the Norwegian pronunciation of the language.

dd in Welsh has the sound of th.

dż in Polish is sounded like dzy.

g before a consonant and before the vowels a, o, and u mostly has the sound of g in go; and it has the same sound before other vowels also in German and Danish, and in all situations in Polish and Welsh. After a vowel it frequently has in German and Danish a guttural sound, and in the Norwegian pronunciation of the latter language it is often silent in that situation. In Dutch it is always a deep guttural, except in the combinations gh and ng, the former of which is pronounced like g in go, the latter like ng in sing. In French, Portuguese, Spanish, and Swedish it has the sound of the j of the same languages in all situations in which it has not the sound of g in go, and in Italian it is then sounded like our j. (See above under c.)

gh in Italian and Dutch has the sound of g in go.

gl in Italian has the sound of ly.

gn in French and Italian has the sound of ny.

gu in French always, and in Portuguese and Spanish before e and i, has the sound of g in go.

gy in Hungarian has the sound of dy or dzh.

h in French, Italian, Spanish, and Portuguese is silent or scarcely audible. In Spanish it is heard as a slight aspiration before the combination ue. In Danish it is not sounded before j and v.

j in most languages has the sound of y, in French and Portuguese that of zh, in Spanish that of ch. In Danish the sound of the Danish j (that is, the sound of the consonant y) is always interpolated after the consonants k and g before the vowels æ, ö, ø, y, and i. In Hungarian at the end of a syllable j has the sound of e in me.

k in Norwegian before e, i, j, y, and the modifications of a and o, is sounded like ty.

ł represents in Polish a sound peculiar to that language and Russian. It is produced by attempting to sound an l with the point of the tongue directed further back in the palate than for the ordinary l, and with very slight contact between the tongue and palate.

lh in Portuguese has the sound of ly (Ital. gl).

ll in French in formal speech has the sound of ly, but colloquially is generally sounded like the consonant y without any l-sound. In Spain it always has the former sound, but in Mexico the latter is often substituted. In Welsh it has a peculiar sound, which is approximately rendered when one attempts to pronounce tl at the beginning of a syllable.

m in French and Portuguese often has the sound of n. See preliminary remarks.

ñ in Spanish

ń in Polish

ř in Bohemian

nh in Portuguese

all have the sound of ny (French and Italian gn).

qu in French always, and in Portuguese and Spanish before e and i, is sounded like k.

r is almost always more strongly trilled than in English.

ř in Bohemian

rz in Polish

are both sounded like *rz*h.

s in German is usually pronounced soft, like English z, at the beginning of a word where a vowel follows; in Hungarian it is sounded as sh.

ś in Polish has the sound of sy.

sc in Italian before e and i has the sound of sh. (See above under c.)

sch in German has the sound of sh, but in Dutch and Italian has that of s followed by the respective sounds of ch, in Dutch accordingly it is equivalent to sch, in Italian to sk.

sk before e, i, j, y, and the modifications of a and ø is sounded in Norwegian like sh.

stj in Swedish when followed by a vowel has the sound of sh.

sz in Polish

š in Bohemian are both sounded like sh.

sz in Hungarian is sounded like s.

t in Spanish is dental like the Spanish d.

th in Welsh is sounded like th in thin, in all other European languages using the Roman alphabet like the simple t.

tj in Swedish when followed by a vowel has the sound of ch in chain.

ts in Hungarian is sounded like ch in chain.

w in German and Dutch has a sound closely resembling that of v produced by bringing the lips feebly into contact, not by placing the upper teeth against the lower lip. In Welsh it has the sound of u or ö.

x in Portuguese has the sound of sh; in old Spanish spelling it is used where j is now used to represent the sound of ch.

y is usually a vowel, but in Spanish it has also a consonantal sound like the English y, and the same sound is heard in Hungarian after d, g, l, n, and t.

z in German and Swedish has the sound of ts, in Italian sometimes that of dz sometimes that of ts, in Spanish that of th in thin. In Spanish America this th-sound usually gives place, like the th-sound of c, to that of s in sing.

ž in Polish has the sound of zy.

ż in Polish

ž in Bohemian and Servian zs in Hungarian

all have the sound of zh.

B. Hints on the pronunciation of geographical names belonging to languages not using the Roman alphabet.

The general rule regarding the spelling of such names is to spell them in English phonetically in accordance with the prevailing sounds of the letters of the English alphabet. In such phonetic spellings, however, the vowels usually receive their continental sounds (as in far, vein, pique, rule). In Indian and some other Asiatic names and in Arabic names a is often used also to represent the sound of the English u in but. The vowel digraph ai usually represents the sound of y in fly, but sometimes (as in all Greek names) that of a in fate; ei, most commonly that of a in fate, but sometimes that of y in fly; au for the most part sounds as ow in now, but in some cases as a in fall. In the spelling of Indian names this last digraph is often used where á is now mostly used, the sound intended being that of a in far, or perhaps one somewhat broader. The consonants j, w, y, z have as a rule their characteristic English sounds, as in jet, yet, well, zeal; g usually has its hard sound as in get. Ch usually represents the sound which it has in chain; gh sometimes that of a very rough aspirate, sometimes a sound like that of the Northumberland or Berwickshire burr, sometimes, before e or i, merely the hard sound of g; kh is the combination most frequently used to represent the sound of gh; and th usually stands for the sound which it has in thin, sometimes for that which it has in then.

In the spelling of geographical names belonging to languages which do not use the Roman alphabet (as also of those which were first put in writing by Europeans) numerous variations are found from different causes, and it will throw some light on the pronunciation to note what the principal causes of these variations are.

1. Very often the variation is due to the irregularity in the use of our own alphabet, which leads one person to represent the same sound phonetically in one way, another in another. From this cause s and z are frequently interchanged, as in Kasan, Kazan; so also are oo, ou, and u, where the sound of u in bull or in rule is intended, as in Moorzook, Mourzouk, Murzuk, &c.; and so also are i and y, as in Ustyansk, Ustiansk; Krasnoyarsk, Krasnoiarisk. Hence likewise those names which are spelled with a to represent the sound of u in but, are also frequently found spelled with u, as in Panjab, Punjab.

2. Sometimes the variation is due to the obscurity of the sounds themselves, as where a vowel sound is so short that its exact quality can hardly be determined, as in Bedouin, Bedawin; or where a short vowel sound seems to one ear to make a separate syllable, while to another ear no such syllable seems to be heard, as in Bassora, Basra; Wargela, Wargla.

3. In other cases the variation is due to the adoption in English of a continental mode of spelling, as where dj is adopted from the French for j, as in Djebel for Jebel, or tch from the same language for ch, as in Nertchinsk for Nerchinsk, Kamtchatka (the common spelling) for Kamchatka, or j from the practice of most continental nations for y, as in Jakutsk for Yakutsk.

When the variation in spelling is due to any of these causes, a comparison of the different forms of the name will often serve as a good indication of the correct pronunciation, where any one of them might leave it doubtful; for the correct pronunciation must be more or less consistent with all the different forms. Thus when Bassora is also found spelled Basra it is clear that the correct pronunciation cannot be Basso'ra, and when Bedouin is found spelled also Bedawin, Bedaween, &c., it shows that the accents lie on the first and third syllables, and that the i in Bedouin is pronounced as e in me.

4. Other variations are due to the fact that the sounds to be represented have no signs for them in the Roman alphabet or any of its commonly used digraphs, so that different signs are adopted to represent them approximately in accordance with the conceptions of different persons. One of the chief instances of this sort is a sound existing in Arabic and Hindu resembling the Northumbrian burr. Usually this sound is represented by gh, but in the case of many Arabic names in North Africa it is often represented by rh or r. Thus Ghadames is often spelled Rhadames, the tribe of the Songhay often Sonrhay.

5. In other cases the variation is accounted for by differences of dialect, or different pronunciations of the same dialect in different parts of the country or region in which a particular language is spoken. In this way arise many of the varieties of spelling in Chinese, Indian, and Arabic names. In the last one of the most notable dialectical peculiarities of pronunciation is in the case of the Arab character usually sounded as j, but in some parts, as in Egypt, as g in get. For this reason the Arabic Jebel (mountain) is usually spelled in Egyptian names Gebel, in which g is intended to have its hard and not its soft sound.

6. Another cause of variation is the fact that the strict rule of phonetic spelling is sometimes departed from, and the English form of a name is partly accommodated to the spelling of the language to which it belongs, the same letter in that language being always represented by the same in English, even though the pronunciation may vary in the original language. This is frequent in Russian names, in which the sounds of v and f, those of a and o, &c., are often represented by the same letter, and in which the Russian character representing the sound of a in fate or e in met sometimes stands for the same sound preceded by that of the consonant y. In this way are explained such variations as Kief, Kiev; Semipolatsinsk, Semipalatinsk; Semiryechensk, Semirechensk.

7. Lastly, the foreign spelling of a name is sometimes adopted for native names in regions out of Europe belonging politically to European powers. Thus Sourabaya may sometimes be seen spelled in the Dutch fashion, Soerabaja. In Spanish and Portuguese America this is done almost uniformly.

In Chinese the digraph ao represents the sound of a in far gliding into that of o, the whole sound closely resembling that of ow in now; ei represents the sound of a in fate gliding into a very short e-sound (as in me); in ia, ie, iu the sounds of a, e, u are preceded by a very short i-sound, a sound almost identical with that of the consonant y; oo (for which u is often used) usually represents the sound of u in bull or in rule, but sometimes it represents a long o gliding into a very short sound like that of u in bull. When o precedes a or ei it is sounded very short so as to be almost equivalent to the consonant w; hence we have such spellings as Whangho (or Hwangho) and Kweichoo or Queichoo, as well as Hoangho and Koeichoo. The initial ng is a nasal, as in the word sing (not as in finger), and this initial sound is also met with in names belonging to the other monosyllabic languages of Eastern Asia, as well as in some African and New Zealand names.

In Indian, Arabic, and some other names aspirated consonants occur, and are represented in spelling by an h following the consonant, as in Bhagalpur. The proper sound of this combination is accurately represented by the letters composing it, but in the English pronunciation of such names this peculiarity is commonly disregarded.

In African words the consonant m used as a prefix has a shortened sound of um, and in the South African colonies this prefix is so spelled, as in Umtata, Umtzila, &c. By travellers in equatorial Africa, however, the simple m is always used, as in Mpwapwa. Except at the end of a word y is always the consonant. Lake Nyassa, for example, is to be pronounced as two syllables, Nyas'sa, not in three as Ni-as'sa.

For the spelling of Maori names in New Zealand the Roman alphabet was introduced by the English missionaries, but only fourteen characters are required, namely, a, e, h, i, k, m, n, o, p, r, t, u, w, and the nasal ng. The vowels have the continental sounds, and are always sounded separately, never coalescing into a proper diphthong.

In the following list showing the pronunciation of geographical names the only diacritic marks which are used are the acute, grave, and circumflex accents (´, `), the modification mark (¨), the cedilla (¸), and the tilde (~); and it will be understood that, where the respelling of a name indicates the pronunciation of a diacritically marked letter not so marked in the name as given in the list, that name is spelled with a letter so marked in the language of the country to which it belongs. Thus, when it is stated that the Swedish name Tornea is pronounced tor'nä-ö, it may be inferred, in accordance with the rules just given, that in Swedish that name is spelled Torneå. In respelling names to indicate pronunciation the consonants, b, d, f, h, j, k, l, m, n, p, r, t, v, w, and z, and the digraphs ng, nk, and sh always have their usual English sounds, and s always has the hissing sound as in sea. The key-line gives the explanation of the other signs.

Note.—In consulting this List it should be kept in mind that attention to the preceding notes indicating the variations that may be looked for in the spelling of foreign names will often be of assistance to those doing so in finding the name they are in search of, since names not found under one spelling may be found under some other equivalent spelling. Thus many names not found spelled with c, ch, z, y, &c., may be found under the spellings k, kh, s, j, &c. respectively; Spanish names in x may be found spelled with j, Dutch names in y may be found in ij, German, Danish, and other names in ae or oe may be found in ä (sometimes e) or ö; and so forth.

DESCRIPTION OF THE PLATES.

LANGUAGE.

THE LANGUAGES OF THE WORLD AND THEIR GEOGRAPHICAL DISTRIBUTION.

THERE are various estimates as to the number of languages spoken on the earth, but the best modern authorities set them down at about 1000. Many of these are spoken only in a small locality and by very few people; and the languages of real importance are not very numerous. The question as to the number of distinct languages is rendered all the more difficult by the existence of dialects, and it is often nearly impossible to say whether an idiom should rank as a language or as a dialect. A language that comes to be spoken over a considerable area and by a considerable number of persons—more especially when it is not to some extent fixed by writing and literature—is sure to develop dialects, and each of these may in course of time become unintelligible to the persons using the others, if the respective speakers have little intercourse with each other, being separated perhaps by mountain ranges, arms of the sea, or merely by distance. In this way is the existence of the different Teutonic tongues to be accounted for. A similar instance of several languages arising from one is seen in the case of the Romance tongues—Italian, French, Spanish, and Portuguese—all of which are descended from the Latin. Many languages have been as yet but little studied, and in consequence a thoroughly scientific classification of the whole is not possible. Probably, however, investigation has gone sufficiently far to enable us to know pretty well what are the main types prevalent among the tongues that are or have been spoken by man.

When we compare languages as to their morphological features, that is, as to their elements and structure or the manner in which their sounds are formed and combined, we can distinguish three chief forms or classes. These are the monosyllabic or isolating, the agglutinate or agglutinating, and the inflectional.

The monosyllabic languages, of which the Chinese is the chief example, are composed mainly of monosyllabic unchangeable roots or words, which may be indeed compounded with one another to express their mutual relations, but as a rule do not by this process lose their own independence and individuality.

The agglutinate languages, of which the Turkish and Hungarian are examples, are characterized by their words consisting of roots having suffixes tacked or as it were glued on, the roots and suffixes maintaining each a sort of separate existence and independence. The root stands distinctly out from the rest of the word, and is seldom or never so fused with the suffixes as to be inseparable from them.

The inflectional languages are regarded as of the highest type, and to these belong the languages of the most highly civilized races, such as Greek, Latin, English, German, Sanskrit, Hebrew, &c. In these languages the original roots themselves have undergone various modifications for the purpose of expressing different shades of meaning; and the line between roots and suffixes is by no means sharply drawn. Inflection may exist in varying degrees of fulness and complexity, some languages showing far more of it than others. The two most widely known of the inflectional languages, Greek and Latin, have a vast number of verbal and other inflections, while English, for instance, has now very few, such as the possessive case of nouns, the nominative, possessive, and objective of pronouns, a few verbal forms, &c. The falling away or wearing down and ultimate loss of inflections is a well-known phenomenon; Anglo-Saxon, for instance, had far more than modern English, and Latin was far richer in this respect than French, Italian, and the other tongues to which it has given birth.

Of the vast majority of languages no historical account can be given, as they possess no written memorials to enable us to trace their history backward. Of other languages, however, we can trace the origin and development by means of documentary evidence, and can thus show what is their genealogical relationship to one another. Thus French, Italian, Spanish, and the other Romance tongues can be proved to be descendants of the Latin. By thorough investigation and comparison we can even safely go farther back than written documents carry us, and in this way philologists have come to the conclusion that the Germanic or Teutonic tongues (including English, German, Dutch, &c.), Greek, Latin, Persian, Sanskrit, &c., are all descended from a common language that in prehistoric times was spoken in Central Asia (some think in Europe or on the borders of Asia and Europe, where European and Asiatic Russia now meet) by the ancestors of the respective peoples, then forming a single community.

The following are the principal families and groups of languages that have been recognized. Besides consulting the map, the reader may refer also to the paper on ethnology accompanying the ethnological plates. It must be remembered, however, that race and language are not necessarily co-extensive, and that the same language may be spoken by two peoples that are very different from an ethnological point of view. Conquest often imposes an alien tongue upon a people, and thus the Latin language, originally spoken by a small community in Italy, spread itself over a wide area outside of this peninsula. Similarly English has left only a small area to the Celtic tongues in the British Islands, as the Celtic no doubt displaced an earlier idiom in the same area.

I. THE INDO-EUROPEAN OR ARYAN FAMILY.—This family of languages is now the most important and widely spread of any, as well as the most highly cultivated and developed. The peoples speaking these tongues have long been the most civilized on the face of the earth, though the Indo-European races do not seem to have been the earliest civilized. The languages of this family are inflectional, and the character of the most important among them is sufficiently well known. It is divided into the following groups or branches:—

1. The Indian Group.—This includes the Sanskrit, Prakrit, and Pali—Indian languages, which are no longer spoken; and among living Indian languages the Hindi, Hindustani or Urdu, Bengali, Marathi, Gujarati, Singhalese (Ceylon), &c.

2. The Iranic Group.—To this belong the Zend, Old Persian and Pahlavi (now dead languages), modern Persian, Kurdish, Beluchi, Afghan or Pushto, Ossetian (in the Caucasus), &c.

3. The Armenian.—Formerly classed in the Iranian group, but now regarded as having an independent position.

4. The Grecian Group.—Includes the ancient and modern Greek and Greek dialects.

5. The Albanian.—Formerly often classed along with the Greek.

6. The Italic or Latin Group.—This includes the ancient Latin, Umbrian, and Oscan, and the modern Romance or Romanic tongues, viz. Italian, French, Spanish, Portuguese, and Roumanian. As a result of emigration the Romance tongues, more especially Spanish and Portuguese, are now spoken over a large portion of America.

7. The Celtic Group.—The Cymric of Wales and Brittany, the Irish, the Gaelic, and the Manx of the Isle of Man.

8. The Slavo-Lettic Group.—In two divisions; a. Slavonic: Russian, Polish, Bohemian, &c.; b. Lettic: Old Prussian, Lithuanian, Lettish.

9. The Germanic or Teutonic Group.—In this group there are two chief sub-divisions, viz. (a) East Germanic: Icelandic or Old Norse, Danish and Swedish, with the long extinct Gothic; (b) West Germanic: Anglo-Saxon with English, Dutch, Frisian, Plattdeutsch, German. Another division is into (a) East Germanic (Gothic); (b) North Germanic or Scandinavian; and (c) West Germanic, the rest. The most important and widely spread of these tongues is now English.

With the exception of the sacred scriptures all the most valuable literature of the world is written in one or other of the tongues belonging to the Indo-European family.

II. THE HAMITO-SEMITIC FAMILY.—The Hamitic and Semitic groups of this family (which belongs to the inflexional class) have a certain number of roots and features in common; but grammatically the Hamitic tongues are but little while the Semitic tongues are highly developed. The Semitic languages are characterized by the possession of roots containing three consonants which always remain unchanged however much the vowels may vary. The Hamitic tongues are confined to Northern Africa. Among them are to be ranked the ancient Egyptian of the monuments and papyrus rolls, and the Coptic. The Semitic group includes Hebrew, Aramaic, Phœnician, Chaldean, and Assyrian, tongues of great historic importance, the living Arabic, Ethiopian, or Classical Abyssinian, &c.

III. THE URAL-ALTAIC FAMILY (also called Turanian and Scythian).—The languages of this family are of the agglutinate type. The grammatical structure is very simple, every word consisting of an unchangeable root and one or several suffixes. The latter are very numerous in some members of the group, and express the most varied grammatical relationships, there being great richness in declensional and conjugational forms. One remarkable feature of these languages is called the law of harmony, and is exhibited in the vowel change which the suffixes undergo, according to what happens to be the vowel of the root to which they are joined.

These tongues are spoken over a great part of Northern, North-eastern, and Central Asia and Northern Europe. They are usually divided into five groups: 1, Finnish-Ugrian; 2, Samoiedic; 3, Turkish; 4, Mongolian; 5, Tungusic. The Finnish-Ugrian and the Turkish are the most important of these groups. The former comprises not only Finnish, Lapponic, Estonian, &c., but also Magyar or Hungarian. The Turkish group comprises Turkish proper or Osmanli, and also a number of other tongues spoken in Central Asia.

IV. THE INDO-CHINESE FAMILY.—This family comprises Chinese and the languages of South-east Asia, viz. Anamitic, Siamese, and Burmese, together with the Tibetan. These languages have one character in common, namely, that they consist mainly of monosyllabic roots which undergo no change. The part of speech that any root for the time being represents depends on its position in the sentence. There are also some elements in these languages which have hardly the character of roots, having little meaning in themselves and being joined to roots somewhat like inflexions. Though these languages have such a similarity in structure, their exact relationship to each other is not really known. The Japanese and Corean are generally classed apart from these and also from each other.

V. THE DRAVIDIAN FAMILY.—The chief members of this family are Tamil, Telugu, Canarese, and Malayalam, all of which are spoken in Southern India, together with Brahui, spoken in a part of Beluchistan. Tamil is also spoken in Ceylon. In structure these languages resemble the Ural-Altaic, with which they have sometimes been classed; but they also possess certain inflexional elements.

VI. THE BANTU FAMILY.—This family (so called from Kafir abantu, people) extends over the greater part of Southern Africa from the Cape Colony to 8° north latitude on the west and to the equator on the east coast. There are a number of different tongues embraced under this family, including the Kafir tongues, Kisuahili, Sechuana, Herero, Congo, Mpongwe, &c. The Bantu languages are rich in inflexions, which have the remarkable peculiarity of taking the form of grammatical elements prefixed to words. They also possess a considerable number of articles or pronouns which are prefixed to verbs and parts of sentences. The languages spoken by the Bushmen and Hottentots are not included in the family.

VII. THE MALAYO-POLYNESIAN FAMILY.—Of these there are three main groups: the Malayan, the Melanesian, and the Polynesian. The Malayan extends over a large area, including the peninsula of Malacca and the islands of Formosa, the Philippines (Tagalic), Borneo (Dayak), Celebes, Java (the Kawi or Kavi tongue), Sumatra, and Madagascar (Malagasy). The Melanesian is spoken in the Fiji Islands and in a number of other adjacent islands. The Polynesian extends from New Zealand (the Northern Island) to the Sandwich Islands. These languages, especially those of the Polynesian group, are remarkably agreeable to the ear, being very rich in vowels and poor in consonants. The words are mostly polysyllabic; the grammatical structure is very simple.

VIII. THE AMERICAN FAMILY.—This family comprises the aboriginal languages of North and South America exclusive of the Eskimo in the extreme north. They are exceedingly numerous (having been estimated at 400), and though a general similarity has been recognized among them, it is difficult to mention any features that are common to all and such as to mark them out as a well-defined class or family. Generally speaking they have much of the agglutinative type, but some of them may legitimately be described as inflexional. A common tendency that may be observed is to express as much as possible in one word, a complex idea or several connected ideas being brought together in one compound expression, forming what has been called a word-cluster. These word-clusters gather round verbal roots or assume verbal forms, and hence it is not very far wrong to say that with the exception of pronouns and particles the American languages are made up of verbs, every word having verbal forms. The number of roots in any of the languages is small.

In North America the most important languages are (or were) the Athabaskan, Algonkin, Dakota, and Iroquois. In Central America are spoken the Otomi and Maya, the former presenting somewhat of a monosyllabic character. In South America there is a vast diversity of idioms, and their relationships are generally very obscure. Among native South American tongues we may mention the Kechua or Quichua of Peru (the language of the descendants of those that were ruled by the Incas), the allied Aymara, the Galibi or Carib, the widely spoken Tupi, the language of the warlike Araucanians of Chili, and the Patagonian.

Isolated or Uninvestigated Languages.—Numbers of these exist in Africa, Asia, Australia, &c. Among the most interesting is the Basque, spoken in Spain and partly in France at the angle of the Bay of Biscay, which those who have investigated it have not as yet been able to classify with any other language. It is no doubt an ancient tongue, and is probably a relic of a race that inhabited Western Europe before the arrival of the Indo-Europeans.

GOTHIC ARCHITECTURE.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE PROGRESSIVE DEVELOPMENT AND CHIEF PERIODS OF ENGLISH GOTHIC.

ENGLISH Architecture from the eleventh century to the middle of the sixteenth century has been divided into the following periods or styles.

I. The NORMAN, round-arched or English Romanesque style, extending from the Conquest, 1066, or perhaps a year or two earlier, until the end of the reign of Henry II. in 1189, a period of about 123 years.

II. The EARLY ENGLISH GOTHIC, or first pointed, commencing with the reign of Richard I. (1189), and extending to the end of the long reign of Henry III. in 1272, a period of about 100 years, and answering pretty nearly to the thirteenth century.

III. The DECORATED ENGLISH GOTHIC, or second pointed, commencing with the reign of Edward I. (1272), and extending to the end of the reign of Edward III. in 1377; a period of about 100 years; but in some localities perhaps it continued for ten or fifteen years longer, thus agreeing generally with the fourteenth century.

IV. The PERPENDICULAR ENGLISH GOTHIC, or third pointed, from the beginning of the reign of Richard II. (1377), until the end of the reign of Henry VIII. in 1546, a period of about 169 years. But the architecture of the last two reigns (Henry VII. and VIII.) is usually designated the Tudor or Late Perpendicular.

The architecture of the reigns of Elizabeth and James I., during which a large number of important buildings and mansions were erected, and in which forms of Classic Architecture became mixed with Gothic, is distinguished as Elizabethan and Jacobean respectively.

It must be distinctly understood that no definite line can be drawn between the successive styles; hence there exists a transitional period between each, partaking of the character of both styles, that between Norman and Early English being sometimes distinguished as semi-Norman; that between Early English and Decorated being sometimes called Geometrical or Early Decorated; and that between Decorated and Perpendicular Early Perpendicular or Late Decorated. There is, in fact, no period at which a positive line can be drawn between any of the styles.

During the Saxon era in England architecture was of a very rude and primitive character, but very few perfect specimens of it remain. Edward the Confessor, although an Englishman by birth, was educated in Normandy, and had a predilection for Norman manners and Norman customs. Westminster Abbey accordingly, which he founded, was erected in the Norman, or "new" style, and was consecrated on Dec. 28, 1065, only a few days before his death.

Norman Period.—The Normans were great church and castle builders, and upon the landing of William I. and his taking possession of the country, Saxon buildings were demolished and were replaced by others of a more majestic character and upon a grander scale until the whole country was covered with Norman churches and cathedrals. Many Norman castles were also erected. Of the Norman minster at Westminster very little now remains, but the churches throughout the country, or parts of churches erected at this time, are still very numerous, and nearly every cathedral retains large portions of Norman work—as at Durham, Canterbury, Oxford, Peterborough, Norwich, Ely, Rochester, and others.

The example Fig. 1 on our plate, St. Mary's Church, Por-chester, Hampshire, is a particularly good example of a small Norman west front in good preservation. It was built within the castle of Porchester, and was a portion of a priory of canons of the order of St. Augustine, founded by Henry I. The date of its erection is ascertained to have been A.D. 1133. The early character of the Norman style was that of great massiveness and simplicity, with very few ornaments beyond the billet moulding and zigzag, as seen in the choir of Waltham Abbey, shown in fig. 2. The monastery of Waltham was founded by Harold in 1062, but of the work erected during his time probably no portion remains. The present church dates somewhat early in the twelfth century. It shows some of the most distinctive features of the style: massive cylindrical piers with spiral flutings, cushion capitals, and semicircular arches. Towards the end of the period pointed arches were used, and interlaced arcades forming pointed arches. These have been considered by some persons to have been the origin of the pointed arch. During the reign of Stephen the style became very much enriched by the use of a profusion of ornaments. This was particularly the case in doorways (see the small example fig. 1), of which many elaborate examples remain, as at Iffley Church, Oxfordshire; Ely, Lincoln, and Durham Cathedrals; besides a great number of others. In many churches where all else has been swept away to make room for alterations, the highly enriched Norman doorway has been carefully preserved.

The Norman architects were not distinguished for their science in construction. The walls of their buildings were of great thickness, and the piers supporting their arches were usually of an enormous size, yet notwithstanding this strength and massiveness the architects understood the thrust of their arches so little that their works frequently gave way. A notable instance of this occurred in the year 1107, when the central tower of Winchester Cathedral fell, although it had only been completed in 1093. Norman buttresses were flat and broad (see fig. 1) and of little projection from the wall. Their successors, by the use of boldly projecting buttresses (fig. 3) greatly reduced the thickness of their walls. The windows in this style are generally small, except in very large buildings, but a double window divided by a shaft is not uncommon in towers.

Transition to Early English.—Of the transitional period between Norman and Early English a very valuable example remains in the Choir and Trinity Chapel of Canterbury Cathedral, of which the date is well known. A great fire occurred at Canterbury in 1174 by which the whole of the eastern portion of the cathedral was burned down. An account of this and of the rebuilding of the cathedral was written by Gervase, a monk of Canterbury, which has been preserved. He tells us that after the disastrous fire "French and English artificers were summoned," and among others there had come William of Sens. "Him therefore they retained on account of his lively genius and good reputation, and dismissed the others." By him the work was commenced in 1175, the year after the fire, and carried on until 1179, when he was severely injured by a fall, and another succeeded him in the charge of the works. "William by name, English by nation, small in body, but in workmanship of many kinds acute and honest."¹ He carried the work to completion in 1184. It marks, although the work has somewhat of a French character, great progress in construction and also in the art of sculpture. The proportions are much lighter and higher than the former work, and the choir and transepts are vaulted in stone with elegant groining, a feat which had never been accomplished before this time. For although Norman aisles had been groined in stone, the naves, choirs, and wider parts in the cathedrals of the Norman period had flat ceilings of wood, frequently enriched by painting, as still to be seen over the nave of Peterborough Cathedral.

Another contemporary transitional work, but perhaps a little earlier, is that of Christ Church Cathedral, Oxford, consecrated in 1180. Here the proportions are not so good as at Canterbury, but both exhibit marked features which show them to be precursors of the Early English. Although in both examples the round arch is retained, yet there is no appearance of the cushion capital. The foliage is free and elegant, springing upright from the necking of the column and turning over gracefully under the abacus. That at Oxford in some cases very much resembles the Early English; but at Canterbury it has more of the Early French character. The dog-tooth ornament which is distinctive of the Early English is used in both examples.¹

The hall of Oakham Castle, Rutlandshire (A.D. 1165-1191), is also an excellent specimen of transitional work. The capitals are very similar to some at Canterbury; the tooth ornament is freely introduced, and the windows are round-headed within and pointed without.

Early English Style.—Extreme lightness of proportion, height, and elegance was introduced by the Early English style. The grouping of windows, with acutely pointed or lancet arches, well-projecting buttresses and pinnacles, as in the North Transept of Beverley Minster (see fig. 3), were some of the principal characteristics of the style. The windows were, almost universally, long, narrow, and lancet-headed, and a variety of appearance and expression resulted from the combinations of the single window. Often two and three windows were combined, as at Beverley, and sometimes there are combinations of five and even of seven. On the circular windows, as in the gable and aisles of Beverley, much care was bestowed. York and Lincoln have very fine large windows of this kind, and that in the south transept of York, usually called the marygold window, is extremely rich and elegant.

The builders of the Early English period greatly excelled in scientific construction, and discontinued the use of the enormous masses of masonry found necessary by the Normans, thereby imparting great lightness and elegance to their work. Cathedrals were roofed with graceful stone groining, the lateral thrust of which was taken from the clere-story by flying buttresses, which again transferred it to the heads of the aisle buttresses. These buttresses were well proportioned for the duty which they had to perform, and were frequently additionally strengthened by pinnacles or heavy buttress gablets.

Instead of the heavy cylindrical piers of the former period, those of the Early English usually consisted of a central shaft with four or more small detached shafts clustered round it. The small shafts were often of purbeck or other marble, and connected with the central shaft by one or more moulded bands. A good example of this is seen in the chapter-house of Lincoln Cathedral. (Fig. 5.) Others are to be found at Westminster Abbey and Salisbury Cathedral. The capitals were either richly moulded or filled with flowing foliage, rising directly from the necking, and the abacuses were invariably round instead of square as in the Norman. The leaves of the foliage consisted mostly of three rounded lobes, said to have been taken from the Water Avens or Herba benedicta, but they were also frequently formed of four and five deeply divided lobes. Small and slender detached shafts were constantly introduced in the jambs of windows and doors, with long lines of the dog-tooth ornament between. These were repeated in the hollows of the mouldings above.

Doors in large buildings were frequently double under one general arch, the spandril being filled with a quatrefoil, as at Beverley, fig. 3, and Salisbury, fig. 4. Two-light windows towards the later period of the style were treated in the same manner, and in some instances the heads of the windows were trefoiled. These form the early indication of the traceried windows of the next period.

Early English chapter-houses were very elegant structures, usually groined internally with ribs springing from a central clustered pier, as at Lincoln, fig. 5. The form of the building is a decagon, and the central pillar is surrounded by ten purbeck shafts, held together by a central band and finished by a richly foliated capital. The vaulting springs from the walls from clustered shafts supported on foliated capitals. The intersections of the ribs are enriched by well-designed foliated bosses. The chapter-house at Westminster is of this period and is in advance of what had been seen in architecture up to that time. The windows are of four lights, separated by mullions, and not distinct windows; and have quatrefoils in the heads under one general arch, marking the transition to the Geometrical Period. Salisbury, which is somewhat later, has windows like those at Westminster, and with an entrance-door (fig. 4) which is one of the most perfect and elegant works of the period. Salisbury Cathedral is almost entirely in the Early English style, having been begun in 1220 and finished in 1258. The chapter-house is a little later than the cathedral itself; but the grandest work of this period was the work of Henry III. at Westminster Abbey, A.D. 1245-1269, and the beauty and elegance of the proportions of the choir and transepts are unsurpassed by any other work.

Decorated Style.—In early decorated buildings the spaces or piers between the groups of windows were reduced until they became mullions and the heads were filled with geometrical tracery, as seen in the example fig. 9, the west front of Howden Church, Yorkshire. Pinnacles and gables became crocketed, and triangular canopies were introduced, as may be observed over the central window in same example. In later decorated the lines in the tracery of windows became flowing, sometimes distinguished as flamboyant, and the number of ribs in groining were increased, as in the north aisle of St. Mary's Church, Beverley (fig. 7). Towers were often crowned with lofty octagonal stone spires, with the angles hipped, technically called "broach" spires, as at Anwick, Lincolnshire (fig. 6). The spire was enriched by lucarne windows placed alternately and diminishing in size towards the top. Buttress caps were frequently canopied and crocketed. This is seen more distinctly in the porch of Heckington Church, Lincolnshire (fig. 8), where the buttresses have also niches and ogee canopies above them. Sculptured foliage was no longer after the manner of the Early English, but was taken more directly from nature and was very rich and full of light and shade. The Hawthorn, Maple, and other natural foliage was treated with great skill and beauty. The west front and nave of York Cathedral, dating from 1348, and the nave of Exeter Cathedral (1331-1350) are good typical examples of the style. Piers were formed of groups of small shafts, but they were not detached as in the previous style. The characteristic ornament of the period was the ball-flower,² and in some buildings, as in the south aisle of Gloucester Cathedral, it was used in such profusion that the tracery as well as the jambs and arches of the windows are literally covered with them. Castles of the Edwardian period are very numerous, and there are also numerous remains of monastic buildings of this period, especially gate-houses. The gateway of Battle Abbey, Sussex (fig. 10), is a good example, and from the abbot having obtained a license to fortify and embattle the monastery in 1339, which it was necessary to do at that time, we know within a year or two the date of the work.

Perpendicular Style.—The west front of Winchester Cathedral, fig. 11, gives a very interesting example of the Early Perpendicular style, for so rapid was the change from the

² See fig. 10, Plate of Ornament.

Flowing Decorated that we already see the perpendicular lines in the great window and the upright panelling of the gable above as well as other parts. This is said to be the work of Bishop Edington, who died in 1366, but probably left the work incomplete. The alteration of the nave from the Norman to the Perpendicular style was carried out by William of Wykeham, who probably finished Bishop Edington's work. The porches are later than the other parts. Rushden Church, Northamptonshire, fig. 12, is an example of a Perpendicular tower and spire. The buttresses terminating at the bottom of the belfry, enriched parapet, pinnacles, flying buttresses, and crocketed spire—these are characteristic features of this style; but there are numerous examples of almost every description of tower appertaining to this period, from the plain short tower of a country church to the elaborate and richly panelled towers of Gloucester, Taunton, and the celebrated lantern-tower of Boston in Lincolnshire. Windows are easily distinguished from those of the preceding style by their mullions running in perpendicular lines through the tracery, and having horizontal transoms (fig. 11). They are often of great width, western windows of Cathedrals frequently occupying the whole breadth of the front between the buttresses. In Norman work the original windows were in many instances destroyed and large perpendicular windows inserted, as at Norwich Cathedral. Doorways, instead of triangular canopies, were surmounted by a square head over the arch, and the spandrels filled with tracery or foliage. Later in the style the arch was made four-centred, as in the porches of Winchester Cathedral (fig. 11), and usually called the "Tudor arch." In piers the shafts were less detached from the central core; and the capitals were commonly octagonal, but much less important than previously, and seldom foliated, except occasionally by a four-leaved flower introduced upon each face. Bases of piers, however, were made much more important, octagonal and of great height, with high plinths below the moulded work. In elaborate buildings nothing is more conspicuous than the panelling, with tracery, all the plain surfaces of the building, as may be seen in Henry VII.'s chapel at Westminster. Niches with canopies above them were of constant occurrence. Panelling was also carried into stone groining, and this, from radiating from its springing point, has been called fan-groining. A most intricate example of this with stone pendants is seen in the roof of Henry VII.'s chapel. Other examples of it exist at King's College Chapel, Cambridge, and St. George's Chapel, Windsor. Enriched cresting to screen-work usually termed the "Strawberry-Leaf Ornament" or "Tudor Flower," is a noticeable feature at this period. The timber roofs of churches and halls of this date were frequently very elaborate and ornamental, as in the celebrated example at Westminster. To this age also belongs the beautiful and richly carved rood-screens, many of which are still to be found, although often in a sadly mutilated state, in the churches of Norfolk and Suffolk.

Later Styles.—During the reign of Henry VIII. a new style was brought into the country, the Renaissance style of Italy. That monarch being fond of foreign artists, engaged Torrigiano to execute the monuments of Henry VII. and his mother the Countess of Richmond. These are the earliest examples (the monument of Henry VII. was finished in 1519) of revived classic architecture in England. The Elizabethan and Jacobean show how English artists attempted to apply these classic forms to our own architecture. In many instances the mixture is most incongruous, but with all its defects a most picturesque style was the result, and when applied to domestic purposes in an age when palatial mansions were required, the result was far from being ineffective and trivial. Many of these grand houses are still remaining, as in the example (fig. 13), Hatfield House, Hertfordshire, which was built by Robert Cecil, first Earl of Salisbury, between 1605 and 1611. Many other noble examples still remain, as Burleigh, Northamptonshire; Crewe, Cheshire; Penshurst, Kent; Audley End, Essex; &c. Framed houses of oak filled in with plaster, commonly called half-timbered houses, were largely erected during the reigns of Elizabeth and James. Great numbers of these still remain in Cheshire, and Chester itself is celebrated for many good examples of this character, some of which are very richly carved.

INSECTS.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF TERMS USED IN ENTOMOLOGY.

INSECTS—Insecta—belong to that great section of the animal kingdom which consists of the invertebrate animals, or animals without an internal skeleton, and to the sub-kingdom Anulosa (Ringed Animals) in that section, forming one of the classes of the division Articulata or Arthropoda, animals characterized by having jointed appendages articulated to the body. The other classes of the Arthropoda are the Arachnida or spiders, the Myriapoda or centipedes, and the Crustacea or crabs. The general characters of insects are: blood white; respiration effected by means of tracheæ or air-tubes; body divided into three chief portions, head, thorax, and abdomen; six jointed legs, and generally two or four wings, all attached to the thorax. The name insects (Lat. in, and seco, to cut) has been given to animals of this class from the fact of their bodies being deeply and noticeably divided into distinct portions. The outer integument of insects is firm and horny, being chiefly composed of the substance called chitine, and it is to it that the muscles are attached. The head consists of several segments amalgamated together, and supports two antennæ or feelers, which assume a great variety of forms in different insects; also two compound eyes, besides in many cases several simple eyes. The mouth of some insects is adapted for biting or chewing, and is therefore called masticatory; others have a mouth adapted for suction, and hence called suctorial. The thorax is composed of three segments (prothorax in front, mesothorax in middle, and metathorax), each of which supports a pair of jointed legs, and the two hinder segments generally carry, in addition, each a pair of wings. The under part of the thorax is called the sternum, and is similarly divided. One or both pairs of wings may be wanting, and the latter is the case in parasitic insects especially. The wings consist, generally speaking, of membranous expansions, supported by hollow tubes called nervures, but they vary greatly in form and texture. The orders into which insects are arranged are chiefly based on the number and nature of the wings. The abdomen consists normally of nine segments. It contains the principal viscera and the organs of reproduction, and is often furnished with such appendages as stings, ovipositors, &c. The alimentary canal varies greatly in different insects; when most fully developed it consists of the gullet, the crop, the gizzard, the stomach, the small intestine, and the large intestine. The respiratory apparatus consists of air-tubes or tracheæ, ramifying through every part of the body, and opening externally on the sides of the insect by apertures called spiracles. The circulation is chiefly carried on by means of a contractile tube called the dorsal vessel, which is placed along the back of the insect, and through which the blood passes from the posterior to the anterior extremity of the body. The nervous system consists mainly in a large ganglion (or nervous centre) above, and a ring round the oesophagus, connected with a chain of ganglia lying along the under side of the abdomen. Insects propagate their species by eggs. The young insect is in the majority of cases unlike the perfect insect, having to pass through a metamorphosis either complete or incomplete before attaining maturity. Those that pass through a complete metamorphosis are called Holometabolic insects, and first appear as the larva, grub, or caterpillar, then as the pupa or chrysalis, and lastly as the imago or winged and perfect insect. Those that undergo the incomplete metamorphosis are called Hemimetabolic; while those that undergo no metamorphosis, but simply increase in size (such as lice and other parasites), are called Ametabolic. Insects are classified in various ways. The chief orders into which insects are usually divided are the following: the Lepidoptera, Coleoptera, Hymenoptera, and Diptera, which are holometabolic; the Hemiptera, Orthoptera, and Neuroptera, which are hemimetabolic.

Order I.—LEPIDOPTERA (Scale-winged), or Butterflies and Moths.

Characters: Insects having four wings, covered on the upper and under surfaces with minute coloured scales resembling dust or flour, and easily removed; mouth a suctorial tube, spiral; head, thorax, and abdomen more or less hairy. Figs. 1 to 9.

Order II.—COLEOPTERA (Sheath-winged), or Beetles.

Characters: Insects having four wings, the two superior, called elytra, being horny or coriaceous, and serving not for flight but as a sheath or defence to the two inferior, which are membranous, folded transversely. Mouth formed for mastication, having a labrum or upper lip, two mandibles or upper jaws, two maxillæ or lower jaws (the jaws moving horizontally), and a lower lip or labium; also maxillary and labial palpi or feelers. Order V.—HEMIPTERA (Half-winged), as bugs, aphides, cicadas, lantern-flies, &c.

Characters: Insects having four wings in general, sometimes wanting; mouth a suctorial, beak-shaped organ, adapted to suck the juices of plants and animals, on which they feed. The Hemiptera proper (or Heteroptera) form a section of this order, and have the basal portion of the anterior wings chitinous or leathery, the remainder membranous. The other important section of Hemiptera is formed by the Homoptera, which have two pairs of membranous wings (or none), the beak springing from the back part of the head. Figs. 32 to 39.

DESCRIPTION OF THE PLATES.

ORNAMENT (ARCHITECTURAL).

EXAMPLES OF THE PRINCIPAL STYLES FROM THE EARLIEST TO THE CLOSE OF THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY.

EGYPTIAN, date about 1800 B.C.

Fig. 1.—Example taken from an Egyptian painting, containing the flowers, alternating with the buds, of the Papyrus and Lotus.

Fig. 2.—Vase or cup, in form of the flower of the Lotus.

Fig. 3.—The winged globe, being a symbolical representation of the sun with the wings of the hawk, accompanied by the sacred serpent, the African Cobra. Usually executed on a large scale and placed over the entrances to the temples.

The earliest style of ornament of which we have any knowledge is the Egyptian, and it has this peculiarity, that the more ancient the monument the more perfect the art. Monuments erected 2000 years before the Christian era are formed from the ruins of still more ancient and apparently more perfect buildings. In the temples of the best periods known, there are stones built into the walls having enrichments of a higher character of art than can be found on any of the existing monuments.

In all other styles we can trace the progress towards greater perfection, and a culminating point from which there is a decline. In the Egyptian we have no traces of infancy; but as far as can be ascertained, it is a purely original style which attained its perfection in the earliest ages. Of its origin we have no records whatever.

Egyptian ornament is highly symbolical, and nearly every form employed has its particular meaning. Ornamental forms are not, apparently, chosen for the sake of beauty of effect, but appear to have been derived from the custom of covering every object with hieroglyphics, whether it be a portion of a temple or an implement of everyday use. In fact the distinction between hieroglyphic writing and ornament is so narrow that it is not possible at all times to separate the one from the other. The natural types used by the Egyptians are few. The Lotus and the Papyrus growing on the banks of the Nile, the one symbolizing the food for the body and the other food for the mind; the feathers of rare birds, which were carried before the kings as emblems of sovereignty; the palm leaf or branch and the twisted cord made from its fibres: these are the few types which form the basis of that immense variety of ornament with which the Egyptians decorated the temples of their gods, the palaces of their kings, their clothes, articles of luxury, and utensils. With forms derived from these natural types, many arbitrary or geometrical forms were mixed up, such as the fret, the spiral or wave scroll, the star, and the zigzag; and yet, probably, every detail, however unimportant, had a symbolical meaning beyond its mere ornamental purpose.

The columns in Egyptian temples are frequently to be looked upon as enlarged representations of the Papyrus plant, the base representing the root, the shaft the stalk, and the capital the flower tied together by bands. There is, however, a great deal of variety and beauty in the forms of the capitals. Some appear to have been suggested by the unopened buds of the Papyrus, while others represent several flowers and half-opened buds. Capitals are also, sometimes, composed of four Isis heads rising out of the flowers; other examples are very gracefully formed of the flowers of the Lotus or of Palm leaves.

Flowing lines are very rare in Egyptian ornamentation, but the formation of patterns by the equal division of similar lines, as by weaving or by an arrangement of parallel lines of ornament, as in fig. 1, are of frequent occurrence. The Egyptians painted everything, and the colours used were principally red, blue, yellow, and green, with black and white to define the outlines and give distinctness to the various colours.

ASSYRIAN, date about 700 B.C.

Fig. 4.—Ornament from Persepolis.

Fig. 5.—Sacred tree from Assyrian sculptures.

Fig. 6.—Border of patera or rose forms. Of frequent occurrence among Assyrian sculptures on the robes of the figures and on borders.

The Egyptian style of decoration was not without its influence upon all the peoples who had intercourse with Egypt, as the Jews, the Assyrians, the Greeks, and more especially the Persians. Cambyses, according to Diodorus Siculus, carried away a colony of Egyptian artists into Persia, and we still see the results of Egyptian influence in the whole basin of the Euphrates, and on the borders of the Persian Gulf, from Nineveh to Persepolis. On comparing the bas-reliefs of Nineveh with those of Egypt we cannot but be struck with many points of resemblance. Not only is the same mode of representation adopted, but the objects represented are oftentimes so familiar that it is difficult to believe that the same style could have been arrived at by two peoples independently of each other. Assyrian sculpture seems to be a development of the Egyptian; but instead of being carried forward, it descended in the scale of perfection, bearing the same relation to the Egyptian as the Roman does to the Greek. In both the Egyptian and the Assyrian styles the ornaments in relief as well as those painted are in the nature of diagrams, and, when sculptured, are in very low relief. The natural types used in Assyria are the Lotus, Vine, Fir-cone, and Palm. The sacred tree (fig. 5) appears to be formed of Palm branches. This emblem occurs frequently on the Assyrian sculptures, often placed between two eagle-headed figures holding fir-cones in their hands. It is supposed to have some reference to the tree of life, so universally recognized as a sacred and mysterious symbol in the religious systems of the East.

GREEK, about 400 B.C.

Fig. 7.—The Anthemion ornament accompanied by the Greek fret or meander, painted upon terra-cotta, from a fragment in the British Museum.

Fig. 8.—The upper portion of a Stele, or sepulchral monument, decorated with what is commonly called a honeysuckle ornament.

Fig. 9.—Double guilloche band.

Greek art took its rise partly from the Egyptian and partly from the Assyrian, but was developed in a new direction, and arrived rapidly at a high state of perfection. The Greeks carried the beauty of pure form to a point which has never since been reached; and from the remains we have of Greek ornament it would appear that the presence of refined taste was almost universal, and that the hands and minds of Greek artists, and even of Greek workmen, were so trained as to enable them to execute beautiful forms with unerring truth.

Unlike the Egyptian, Greek ornament was, however, wanting in symbolism, being purely and simply decorative. Surfaces were exquisitely designed to receive ornament, which they did, at first painted, and in later times both carved and painted. The ornament was no part of the construction, as with the Egyptian; it could be removed and the structure remain unchanged. The natural types from which Greek ornament is derived are not many. They consist principally of the Acanthus, the Honeysuckle, the Lotus or Lily, the Holly, and perhaps a few others. The Anthemion ornament (fig. 7) is formed of the Honeysuckle and Lotus growing from scrolls. It has a decided similarity to many of the arrangements of the Lily so frequently occurring both in Assyrian and Egyptian ornament. The fret or meander (fig. 7), the guilloche or rope ornament (fig. 9), as well as the wave scroll, are characteristic ornaments, but are not of purely Greek origin, as similar ornaments are to be found both in the Egyptian and the Assyrian. The Greek patera or rose is also commonly found in the Assyrian (fig. 6), sculptured in the same flat manner as in the Greek.

The Acanthus foliage, however, appears to be of purely Greek origin. It forms the leafage of the Corinthian capital, which represents a plant growing round a basket, or, as more commonly called, a bell. The two lower rows of leaves represent the plant as growing from the ground, and the scrolls below the abacus are the flower-stems rising from the plant, which, meeting with the obstruction of the tile above, turn down and form the volutes at the angles. This mode of plant growth is the same in all Greek Acanthus foliage; see the example (fig. 8) from an Athenian stele. That is, the whole composition is formed of one plant. The lower leaves represent the plant, out of which issue the flower stems or scrolls that support the flowers, which are of the double honeysuckle type. The natural type of the Greek Acanthus is supposed to be the Acanthus spinosus, but in ornamental treatment it is highly conventionalized, and not a copy of any one plant in particular. The Acanthus type of foliage was so highly appreciated by the Romans that it was varied and worked out by them in the most elaborate manner in capitals and friezes, and in many other enrichments. The earliest known Greek example of the Corinthian is that of the choragic monument of Lysicrates at Athens, the date of which is 335 B.C.

The ornaments on the Parthenon and other Doric temples were painted on the surface of the marble (as in the example fig. 7) in bright flat colours, but of these only a few nearly obliterated fragments remain. The so-called Etruscan vases exhibit a vast variety of the Anthemion and other ornaments, evidently identical with those painted upon the Doric temples. These vases, of the best period, have been proved, although called Etruscan, to be specimens of the purest Greek art, and probably many of them were made at Athens.

ROMAN, about 50 B.C.

Fig. 10.—Frieze rendered from the Greek Anthemion ornament. From a fragment in the Villa Borghese near Rome.

Fig. 11.—Sculptured frieze with scroll and Acanthus foliage. From Rome.

Fig. 12.—Sculptured decoration from an altar in the Museum of the Vatican, Rome.

Roman ornament is simply a development or an elaboration of the Greek. It was, therefore, original only in its treatment of the Greek materials, and it is more than probable that nearly all the great artists employed by the Romans were Greeks. The most splendid Roman examples of foliage and elaborate scroll-work known, are those which have been dug up from the ruins of the Forum of Trajan, belonging to the early part of the second century of our era. They are said to be the work of a Greek—Apollodorus of Damascus—who carried out many great works for the Emperor Trajan. Roman art, therefore, is still Greek art, but under the Roman treatment and Roman love of magnificence the decorations became more elaborate and more profusely developed. In fact, the most florid Greek example, the choragic monument of Lysicrates, becomes a very simple design in comparison with an ordinary Roman specimen. The Corinthian was the favourite order among the Romans. They perfected the capital with richly carved Acanthus leaves and scrolls, and enriched the entablature with foliated friezes of the most gorgeous description, carved the various mouldings most elaborately, and added in the cornice richly foliated consoles, alternating with panels containing boldly carved flowers.

The example fig. 11 elucidates the elaborate nature of their friezes and the combination of Acanthus and scroll foliage with flowers and honeysuckle. The Roman Acanthus leaf is, however, not so sharp in its outlines as the Greek examples, and is said to be derived from another and less spiky species, the Acanthus mollis. There is, however, a considerable variation in the different examples, showing distinctly that they were not all derived from one plant. Fig. 10 retains much of the Greek form of the Anthemion ornament, but without its being a literal copy. In Roman friezes skulls of oxen (supposed to be representations of the heads of animals sacrificed to the gods) were frequently introduced as enrichments, with festoons of fruit and flowers suspended from their horns by ribbons. See fig. 12.

The examples of Roman ornamentation which have come down to us are executed in the most delicate manner, and exhibit great fancy and playfulness of imagination. Boys, animals, and monsters are frequently introduced among the foliage, as the sphinx, the triton, the griffin, with their extremities in many cases merging into scrolls of foliage. Ornamental vases and tazzas of great size, executed in the finest marble, enriched with foliage, and frequently surrounded with bacchanalian processions; marble state chairs, seats, baths, tessellated pavements, altars, sarcophagi, and candelabra, indicate to some extent the luxuriousness of the Roman citizens of high rank, and their love of magnificence.

The Egyptian, the Greek, and the Roman¹ may be distinguished as the three ancient styles. The Egyptian is symbolic, rich and severe at the same time; the Greek is severe and beautiful; and the Roman elaborate and ostentatious. The Romans carried out their works with great splendour and magnificence, until a boundless luxury established an indiscriminate extravagance of ornamental detail. This is well shown in that extraordinary style belonging to the first century of our era, which is so perfectly preserved at Pompeii. But even among the examples found at Pompeii, and doubtless it was the same at Rome, there are many specimens of ornament and decoration of a very high and faultless character.

Fig. 14.—Border of natural foliage upon Chinese fret, from porcelain.

Fig. 15.—Geometrical surface ornament or diaper, in colour, from a porcelain vase. The examples are modern, but probably the same forms have been used for centuries.

Much of the Chinese ornament and other minor works brought to this country appears to indicate the existence of a higher state of art at some former period than can be credited to the Chinese at the present day.

The ornamentation found upon porcelain consists mainly of flowers and foliage; dragons, and birds, conventionally rendered from nature; scenes in gardens containing houses and terraces; and figures delineated in a soft manner but without much expression. The principal charm, however, is in their harmonious colouring, and although they do not apparently proceed by any clearly defined rules, their colours are strangely fascinating to the eye. Their facility in drawing is very great, and they bestow upon their work an infinite amount of labour, delineating with the utmost patience and care every minute portion of the subject they are engaged upon. They are very fond of diapering certain portions of their works, and nowhere is their remarkable power of drawing more observable than in the precision and regularity with which they repeat a complicated geometrical pattern by hand, over a large surface.

The fret which is so frequent among Chinese ornaments is less perfect than the Greek, and is often elongated in a horizontal direction, or used fragmentarily instead of being continuous. Of purely ornamental or conventional forms, besides geometrical patterns, the Chinese possess but very few. They have no flowing conventional ornament, such as we find in most other styles; the place of this is always supplied by representations of natural flowers interwoven with lineal ornament. The characteristic feature of their ornamentation is oddness, and all their works are deficient in the highest grace of art—the ideal.

INDIAN. No date can be given.

Fig. 16.—Surface decoration in colour from painted Lacquer-work in the collection at the Indian Museum.

Fig. 17.—Border of inlaid work upon metal, from the South Kensington Museum. The examples are modern.

The vast extent of India as a country, and the endless variety of examples of its ancient art which are still extant, render the examination and study of its ornament a difficult and extremely intricate subject, and one that cannot be entered upon here. It can only be said, generally, that in the application of the various ornaments to the different portions of the objects decorated, it is almost invariably found that the greatest judgment is shown not only in the highest work of embroidery or most elaborate work of the loom, but even in the decorating of a child's toy or an ordinary earthen vessel. Everywhere there is the same artistic knowledge and instinctive guiding principles—always the same care for the general form, the same absence of all excrescences or superfluous ornament; nothing that has been added without purpose, nor that could be removed without disadvantage.

In the Indian, as in the Egyptian and Assyrian, as well as in the Persian, Moresque, and Arabian, plain surfaces are invariably used for the development of painting or sculpture, and the buildings and other works of these nations are literally covered with elegant combinations of animal or foliated form, while plain moulded work or plain surfaces are scarcely to be found. All are enriched, and yet when sculptured they are not added to or upon the work, as is so frequently the case in our own modern practice, but they are taken out of the surface, and therefore, no matter how elaborate, they do not destroy the breadth or character of the work decorated. Here, then, is a lesson that the European artist may learn from the general treatment of Indian ornamentation. A work may be covered with painting, inlay, or sculptured decoration, as in numbers of the Indian temples or the later palaces and tombs of the Mogul emperors, or, to take a more humble but not less striking example, the elaborately carved but simple form of an Indian sandal-wood box: it is enriched without anything being added to it, or without altering its simple primitive form or construction.

BYZANTINE. Sixth to the tenth century.

Fig. 18.—Spandril from the church of St. Sophia, Constantinople.

The influence of Rome was very great in the early Christian church, and the Romanesque style, a debased form of Roman architecture, was followed in Italy; while at Constantinople, where many Greek artists had settled, a species of Greek art arose which has been denominated Byzantine. The Lombard and Norman styles have come more especially from the Romanesque, although many distinctive Byzantine features may be traced in them. One of the distinctive differences between Byzantine and Romanesque ornament is that the former follows the sharp Acanthus foliage of the Greeks, while the latter is derived from the soft and round-lobed foliage of the Roman period. In the Byzantine the enrichment possesses the peculiarity, besides being sharp-lobed, of the whole surface being covered with leafage, as in the example fig. 18, without showing any ground, and the carving is produced throughout by V-form cutting and taken out of the surface. The Byzantine artists made but little use of nature for their foliated forms: they simply re-worked the Acanthus foliage of the Greek in their own conventional manner.

The earliest as well as the greatest example of the Byzantine school of art is the church of St. Sophia, at Constantinople. The erection of this celebrated building is due to the Emperor Justinian, who ascended the throne in 527 A.D. Contemporary with the erection of St. Sophia were other churches in Constantinople, and that of San Vitale at Ravenna. But buildings of the purely Byzantine style are few and isolated, although in many a Byzantine character is plainly discernible. Venice, however, embraced the style and carried it out in all its purity. In the tenth century was commenced the grand church of St. Mark at Venice, which was erected by Byzantine architects invited from Constantinople for that purpose. The walls of this building, as well as others in the style, are ornamented and lined with glass mosaics containing figures upon gold grounds. The extensive use of mosaic and of gilded backgrounds is distinctly characteristic of this style.

MORESQUE. Eighth to the fourteenth century.

Figs. 19, 20, 21.—Wall diaper and borders from the Alhambra, executed in low relief, and coloured in red and blue, with the prominent surfaces gilded.

This elegant species of ornamentation appears to have been derived from the Persians, from whom the Arabs and Moors are supposed to have learned many of their arts. The art of Byzantium displays an Asiatic influence, showing that much of it was derived from Persian sources. The spandril, fig. 18, from St. Sophia, indicates the origin of the surface decoration of the Arabs and Moors. It will be observed, that although the leafage is a reminiscence of the Acanthus, the scroll is continuous without a break, and the whole is distributed evenly over the entire spandril. This principle is almost universal in Moresque ornament; but another feature was introduced by the Moors. There were often two and sometimes three planes on which the patterns were drawn (fig. 21), the ornaments on the upper plane being boldly distributed over the mass, whilst those on the second interwove themselves with the first, enriching the surface on a lower level, by which admirable contrivance a piece of ornament retains its breadth of effect when viewed from a distance. The celebrated palace or fortress of the Alhambra, built by the Moorish kings of Granada, begun in 1248, completed about 1314, is considered to be the perfection of Moorish art. The severe but picturesque exterior of this fortress, studded with towers, gives no indication of the wealth of decoration and luxury within. The arcades and walls of the interior are moulded in stucco with a richness and beauty of ornament which is quite unrivalled. The patterns are both geometric and flowing, and of great richness. The interiors of domes and roofs are decorated with intricate honeycombed or stalactite patterns very original in design and having great richness of effect. The whole is coloured and gilded in the most elaborate and gorgeous manner.

The architecture has not the charm of symbolism, which was the peculiar feature of the Egyptian ornament. This the religion of the Moors forbade; but the want is more than supplied by the inscriptions from the Koran in Arabic, which are inserted as ornamental bands in every direction. These are interwoven with delicate leafage and scroll-work, and address themselves to the mind as well as satisfy the eye by their ornamental treatment. Moorish art is the offspring of the Koran, as Gothic art is of the Bible. The religion of Mohammed, which spread over the East with such meteor-like rapidity, produced with equal speed an art in unison with its doctrines; and the Mohammedans in various countries still practise the distinctive style of art which grew up with their civilization.

GOTHIC. Twelfth to the sixteenth century.

Fig. 22.—(Early English), thirteenth century. Dog-tooth ornament. The distinctive ornament of the style, much used.

Fig. 23.—(Decorated), fourteenth century. Ball-flower ornament with stem. The distinctive ornament of the style.

Fig. 24.—(Perpendicular), fifteenth century. Foliated enrichment from Bishop Fox's Chantry, Winchester Cathedral.

During the early mediæval period the number three became a mystical number as representing the Trinity; and as nature came to be studied, and artists were searching for symbolical forms, the triplicity of natural leaves appears to have attracted much attention. In the rude Norman foliage triple buds and triple terminations were common, these being evidently the precursors of the more developed triple foliage of the Early English style. The principal features, however, in Norman enrichments were not symbolical, but simply geometrically cut forms. Among these occurred the nail-head—a repetition of small pyramids in rows. This in the next period, the Early English, was enlarged and split into four leaves (fig. 22), exactly like four laurel leaves tied together by their stems. This was used so frequently in thirteenth-century buildings, and oftentimes in such profusion, that it became the distinguishing ornament of that period, as the ball-flower (fig. 23) in like manner became that of the fourteenth century.

In later Gothic, foliage and other ornament gave place to elaborate traceried panelling and moulded work. Capitals, especially, were small and unimportant, simply moulded, and if enriched with foliage at all it was generally limited to the introduction of square roses. A square flower, used both horizontally and diagonally, was a distinctive feature of the Perpendicular period. Quatrefoil panels were the usual enrichment of plain upright surfaces in plinths and tombs, the centres of which were frequently ornamented by square bosses or roses. Arches, string-courses, and cornices, when enriched, became so by a repetition of similar square bosses. But in more important works there were many exceptions where the hollows of the mouldings were beautifully sculptured with elaborate and skilfully designed foliage, as in the example fig. 24. This is most highly and delicately wrought, and is apparently derived from a species of sea-weed. It also illustrates another feature common in late Gothic carving, that of doubling or folding over and reversing the sides of the leafage. In the Tudor period shields and heraldic emblems, as well as grotesque animals, often took the place of foliage.

ELIZABETHAN. Sixteenth century.

Fig. 25.—Flat arabesque frieze in oak.

Elizabethan ornament was strongly imbued with the quaint and grotesque, often amounting to positive ugliness; still it seldom failed of being picturesque. There was, in this style, an evident striving after great richness of effect at the expense of very little labour, but no great eminence in artistic carving was attained. The flat arabesque work which was so extremely prevalent was executed by slightly sinking the ground of the ornament; foliage was very sparingly introduced among such work, but when employed was evidently a reminiscence of the surface decoration so prevalent among the Moors and Arabs. Bunches of foliage and fruit hung up by ribbons were of frequent occurrence. Pierced and scrolled shields, with strap and cartouche work (that is, like twisted card paper) and jewel forms were prominent features. Altogether, the style is made up of a heterogeneous mixture of various elements, of Arabian, Gothic, and Classic forms.

RENAISSANCE (Italian). Sixteenth century.

Fig. 26.—Foliated panel from Venice sculptured in low relief in white marble.

One of the most striking characteristics of Renaissance ornament is the frequent occurrence of panel carving. The shafts of pilasters, dies of pedestals, and all other small plain surfaces are seized upon, surrounded with mouldings, and the sunk panel devoted to ornamentation (fig. 26). The foliage is frequently very tastefully and beautifully designed, and treated with extreme delicacy of execution. The variety in composition is very great, and an enormous number of excellent examples are to be found in Rome, Florence, Venice, Milan, and more or less in the countries where the style employed in these centres of the Italian Renaissance Architecture has been followed. The treatment of flat surfaces in this manner is perfectly good and legitimate, and is one of the best features of the Renaissance manner. The foliage follows the antique Roman, but its character is usually more diversified, refined, and delicate. Beyond this, however, the artists of the early and best period appreciated the exquisite grace of natural form, and they sought nature with the same instinct for the beautiful that has been the feeling with all true art-workers from time immemorial. They went in search of fresh motifs to conventionalize and arrange in their own manner, in order to create new life in their works. But they never fully succeeded in getting rid of the old classic traditions. Ghiberti, however, and a few others adhered more strictly to nature. In the foliage round the architrave of the celebrated bronze doors of the Baptistery at Florence, a great variety of flowers and fruit slightly conventionalized from nature are introduced executed in high relief. The running a central stem up the panelled pilasters was a very usual practice of this period. The stem ordinarily started from a vase or tripod at the bottom, the vase form being frequently repeated several times in the height of the pilaster.

LATER RENAISSANCE. In England, in consequence of the great number of churches and other important buildings which were erected after the great fire in 1666, there was an important demand for wood and stone carvers, and a school of talented workmen was created, at the head of which stands the name of Grinling Gibbons. Gibbons created a style of carving fruit and flowers from nature with marvellous fidelity, and with great artistic feeling. The fault, however, of his style was, that it so frequently consisted of festoons and pendants, artificially hung up in panels and other works he was employed to decorate. The worst period of Renaissance art was during the latter years of the reign of Louis XIV., and in the reign of Louis XV., in France, when what has been derisively called the Rococo style was practised. It abounded with elaborate ornamentation, and rock and shell-work spread over everything. Scrolls, instead of flowing out of each other continuously, became broken up into forms like the letters C and S. Curved lines were employed for everything, whether it was the leg of a chair or table, the plan of a wardrobe or a chest of drawers. Curved lines were alone considered beautiful, and straight lines were avoided wherever it was possible to do so. At the end of the eighteenth century, however, a partial return was made to higher class design, and Greek architecture had its influence upon the ornamentation of the period. Extreme delicacy and elegance were the prevailing features of this time, and chased metal work or ormolu was commonly applied to furniture with excellent effect.

MINING.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF TERMS AND APPLIANCES USED IN MINING.

Fig. 1.—Section across the Somersetshire coal-field, showing the occurrence of beds or seams of coal amongst a series of other strata, and which as a whole are called coal-measures. The appearance of the beds at the surface is termed the outcrop, and the angle formed with the horizon the dip of the strata. The fractures, indicated by the fine lines which interrupt the continuity of the beds, were probably produced by some upheaving force which at the same time gave to the strata, originally horizontal, their present basin shape. These rents, or dislocations as they are sometimes called, are of great importance to the miner, and may be beneficial to him or otherwise according to circumstances; they are frequently called dykes, and are known as up-throw or down-throw dykes according as the edge of strata appears to the observer to be higher or lower in regard to his own position; they are also called shifts or slips, but the common terms are faults or troubles. A line of fault thus cutting off the coal-seam often forms the underground boundary of a colliery, as shown in figures 3 and 4.

Fig. 2.—Vertical section of a coal-pit, showing more in detail the various alternations of strata passed through in sinking. Even in the most productive areas the thickness of the coal-seams forms but a small part of the whole of the beds or measures with which they are associated, namely, indurated clays or shales, blue bands of the miner, and sandstones, usually distinguished as rock, metal, or ganister, and nodular or balls ironstone. The bed immediately below a coal-seam is often penetrated by the roots of plants and trees, showing it to be the soil in which the vegetation whose debris formed the coal grew. These are known as under-clays, or when siliceous as ganister. Beds of limestone are occasionally found in the coal-measures, but they are rare.

Fig. 3.—In working coal-seams there are two general methods or systems adopted, namely, the pillar-and-stall, or stoop-and-room system, and the long-wall or long-work system. The former is shown in the plan, and consists in driving a series of passages named by the miner stalls or rooms (the principal driving or roadway, being called a bord or gate) in such a manner as to divide the coal into rectangular pillars or stoops, resembling the blocks of buildings and streets in a town. The coal is extracted from each pillar in succession, beginning with those most distant from the shaft. On the removal of the pillars the area is abandoned and the roof falls in, its ruins, together with the waste coal and rubbish, forming what is called the goaf or gob.

Fig. 4.—Plan to illustrate the long-wall method of working, where the coal is got at one operation, either by working from the shaft towards the rise of the coal and making safe roadways through the fallen roof by strong stone pillars or walls, or by first driving galleries to the extreme boundary and working the coal back towards the shaft, leaving the goaf or rubbish behind, thus avoiding the necessity of keeping good the roads. Where the goaf is not dangerous from the presence of gas, and the roof is strong, this method is both economical and efficient, as the whole of the coal is at once removed on a long face, and is not subject to the partial crushing that takes place when pillars are left. The long-wall system is more frequently adopted in the working of thin seams.

Fig. 5 is a diagram section through the engine-shaft or pit of a colliery, giving a general notion of the walling and tubbing of shafts, and showing also the various parts of the pumping arrangements. When a shaft passes through soft or insecure strata it is either walled round with brick-work or faced with masonry of ashlar, with accurately made joints bevelled to the centre of the opening; this is called walling, as shown at a b. If water is met with issuing from the strata in considerable quantities a means of damming it back is adopted called tubbing, shown at c d. This consists in lining the shaft with an impermeable casing of wood or iron, generally the latter, which is built up in segments forming rings placed upon each other throughout the depth of the water-bearing beds.

The principal parts of the pumping arrangements shown in the figure are as follows: FFFF force-pumps, PP pump-rods, WW water boxes at each lift, LL lift or bucket pump, B wind-bore of ditto, DD ladders for the use of the pump men.

Figs. 6 and 8 illustrate two of the various forms of safety detaching hooks used in some collieries to guard against accidents arising from overwinding, which causes the rising cage to be brought violently into contact with the head-gear, thereby breaking the rope and otherwise causing serious damage. The safety hook is so constructed that in the event of its coming in contact with a plate or framework fixed to the upper part of the pit frame a suspension bolt is withdrawn, thereby detaching the cage from the rope and arresting its progress, its fall being prevented by safety clutches which are attached to the cage for the purpose.

Fig. 7.—Section across the long-wall face or front of a coal working. The whole coal A is called the bank. It is worked away by a party of men called heavers. A deep groove about 9 inches wide is cut or holed in the lower part of the seam next the floor or pavement along the working face, the overhanging coal being for the time supported by short timber props, or blocks of stone called cogs. When ready for removal the props are knocked away, and the mass of coal either falls by its own weight or is forced down by means of wedges or by blasting. It is then broken up and conveyed to the pit bottom, the small unsaleable coal called slack and the rubbish being thrown behind the men, and forming the goaf or gob. A strong wall c is built for the protection of the ways or bords in the immediate neighbourhood of the working. In most cases a double row of timber or iron props, sometimes called punchcons, FF, is placed about 2 or 3 feet apart, in order to protect the men more securely, as well as those parts of the working through which access is gained to the pit. As the work progresses these supports are removed and placed in advance, the roof behind being allowed to crush entirely in.

Fig. 9 illustrates what is called a creep in coal-mining. If the roof be of hard material, such as sandstone, and the pavement or floor consists of a soft fireclay, the weight of superincumbent strata communicated through the pillars to the floor will often cause the latter to crack and swell up into the passages, spreading sometimes, in spite of attempted remedies, from point to point over a whole district, and ultimately destroying the working. From this cause valuable collieries have been totally ruined and abandoned.

Fig. 10.—In this figure is shown the effect of sits or thrusts, likewise caused by pressure of the strata; it is the reverse of creeps, the floor being hard and the roof weak, the latter crushes in, and, unless it can be prevented by timbering, eventually fills the passages and ruins the colliery.

Figs. 11 and 12 show a side and cross section of Guibal's Ventilating Fan. This machine, the invention of M. Guibal of Liège, is one of the most successful apparatus of its kind which has of late years come into use for the purpose of ventilating collieries. It consists of a series of arms fitted with flat boarded blades, forming a fan which has been made as much as 40 feet diameter, and is revolved by means of steam-power within a closed casing of brickwork. The air is drawn up the shaft of the mine through the centre of the fan, as shown by the arrows in fig. 12, and is discharged into a chimney of gradually increasing dimensions towards the top. The size of the discharge aperture can be regulated by a movable shutter sliding in grooves formed to the shape of the casing. The largest of these machines is capable of exhausting as much as 200,000 cubic feet of air per minute.

Fig. 13 illustrates in a diagram plan the principle adopted for regulating the ventilation of a mine. The arrows indicate the course of the air-currents from the downcast to the up-cast shaft, through a furnace, which in this case circulates the current. The lines drawn at A and B from one pillar to another show the position of trap-doors and partitions, or stoppings as they are called, placed across the passages to prevent the air-current from diverging to the upcast before it has passed through the more distant workings. C C are temporary wooden partitions, or brattices, placed at points where it is necessary to direct the air to the face of a working where men are engaged.

Figs. 14 and 15 represent the usual form of a ventilating furnace, which is considered to be the most efficient and reliable method of ventilating collieries. The furnace itself consists of a plain fire-grate placed under an arch, and communicating with the upcast shaft by means of an inclined drift, called the furnace drift, as shown in fig. 14. The furnace is placed at a distance of from 30 to 40 yards from the bottom of the pit; the object of the inclined drift intervening is to enable the air to get uniformly heated before passing into the shaft, thus promoting a regular upward movement of the whole column in its passage to the surface. In fiery mines the return air from the workings is usually led into the upcast shaft through a higher passage away from the furnace, called the dumb drift, shown in the figure, as it would not be safe to allow it to pass over the furnace fire—fresh air being conducted for the purpose of combustion through other galleries. Fig. 15 is a front view of the furnace, showing the general form of the arches and side passages.

Figs. 16 and 18.—Two forms of the miner's safety-lamp. To guard against explosions of fire-damp in collieries Sir Humphry Davy in 1816 invented the safety-lamp. The common Davy, fig. 18, is a very simple contrivance, consisting of a small oil lamp surrounded by a cylindrical casing of fine wire-gauze, through which material flame will not pass. This gauze cylinder, which has a flat top of the same substance, is secured within a cage composed of 3 or 4 brass wires fitted into a brass ring at each end; the oil vessel is screwed into the lower ring, and the act of screwing locks the lamp, and fixes the gauze so that it cannot be removed without a key. The lamp is carried by a handle attached to a brass plate at the top. There are many modifications of the Davy-lamp; among them the Stephenson, or Geordie, lamp, fig. 16, is one of the safest. It is rather larger and heavier than the Davy, and is provided with a glass cylinder or chimney within the gauze casing next the flame, the air for combustion is admitted through a series of small holes just below the level of the wick, as shown by the arrows in the figure. The light of the Stephenson lamp will go out if the air of the mine becomes dangerously explosive.

Fig. 17 represents in a general way the arrangements adopted for drawing coal from two pits. The engine is placed midway between the shafts, and drives a large drum called the winding drum, on which the ropes are wound in opposite directions, and carried over pulleys down each shaft, thus with their respective cages exerting a counterbalancing effect upon each other. The pit-head, or head-stock, is usually of timber, sometimes of wrought-iron, constructed of two uprights and two back legs strongly framed together, for supporting the guide pulleys or sheaves, &c. The landing-stages, B B are generally raised some 20 feet above the ground, and are floored with cast-iron plates. When the cage reaches the surface the tubs of coal are pulled on to the platform, and the coal discharged into the screens or sieves, to separate the small from the large coal, the empty tub being pushed into the cage again from the opposite side. During the operation of landing the tubs the cage is kept in position at the stage by means of the keeps, which are projecting levers attached to the framework of the pit top and on which the cage rests.

Fig. 19.—A side view of Whitelaw's Safety Catch. To prevent accidents from the breaking of the rope in the process of winding various forms of safety catches have been adopted; these consist of variously constructed levers, or cams, attached to the cage, which are made to grip the guide-rods in the event of the cage being separated from the rope. The figure illustrates a simple and efficient form of such apparatus. The levers A A are kept open by the tension of the winding rope, so as to clear the guides, and when released by the parting of the rope the lower ends are brought up firmly against the sides of the guide-rods, the action being assisted by powerful springs fixed above, and shown at B B; the grip thus maintained is sufficient to hold the cage with its load securely in the shaft until assistance is obtained and a fresh rope attached.

Fig. 20.—A side elevation of the winding cage, which consists of one or more platforms connected together by a light framework of wrought-iron or steel bars, and fitted with iron slides made to fit loosely on three sides of the guide-rods. The cages traverse up and down the pit and receive the tubs or trams of coal. They are constructed with one or more platforms according to the number of tubs they are required to carry, which varies from one to six, or even eight in large collieries. The tubs are wheeled on to a railway formed of angle-iron on the floor of the cage, to which they are securely locked by means of a latch or a bar falling over the ends. When the cage is used for lowering the miners it is provided with a sheet-iron roof as a protection from falling material.

MOLLUSCA.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF CLASSIFICATION AND TERMINOLOGY.

THE Mollusca, or soft-bodied animals (L. mollis, soft), form one of the grand divisions (a sub-kingdom) of the animal kingdom. They are widely distributed, and are commonly known by such names as slugs, snails, limpets, oysters, cockles, whelks, &c. They perform an important part in the grand economy of nature, and furnish food for numerous animals as well as man. They are characterized by having no skeleton, the body soft, and not divided into articulations or rings. In some the body is naked and unprotected, as the common garden-slug; in others, however, it is inclosed in a muscular sac, as the tunicaries; but the great majority have the body protected with a calcareous shell, which takes a variety of forms, always interesting, and frequently highly beautiful. It is to those shelled or testaceous mollusca that we shall chiefly confine ourselves in the present paper, which is intended to elucidate their classification, to show the mutual relation of animal and shell, and to explain the principal terms used by modern writers on the mollusca. Molluscs that have no shell are called naked.

The Shell-bearing molluscs, or Shell-fish, are popularly divided into UNIVALVES, BIVALVES, and MULTIVALVES. The Univalves are those whose shell consists of only a single piece, often open and cup-shaped, as in the limpet, or more commonly of a long cone wound spirally round a real or imaginary axis, as the garden-snail, the whelk or periwinkle. The Bivalves are those of which the shell is formed of two pieces joined by a hinge, as the cockle and oyster. The Multivalves have the shell composed of several pieces. These molluscs are few in number. The shells of the mollusca are secreted by the soft integument or mantle (also called the pallium). The chief mass of the shell is made up of carbonate of lime, with a small proportion of animal matter. Externally the shell is covered with a layer of horny matter called the epidermis or periostracum. The shell increases in size by layer after layer being added by the action of special glands at the edge of the mantle. The matter added to the inner surface of the shell is different from that added to the outer, being nacreous in character, and forming what is known as mother-of-pearl.

Univalve shells are the well-known and characteristic residence of the molluscos animals classed as Gasteropoda (belly-footed), that move by means of a flat disk on the under surface. The shell of a gasteropod may be cup-shaped or tubular; but most commonly, as already mentioned, it forms a tube wound spirally round an axis. If this axis is solid it is called the pillar or columella; if open, the umbilicus, and the shell is then said to be perforate or umbilicated. The turns or revolutions which the cone makes about the axis are termed whorls. These increase in size towards the mouth of the shell, and the last one is frequently as large or larger than the whole of the others together, and is called the body whorl. The part above the body whorl is called the spire. The line of juncture between the whorls is called the suture.

In viewing a spiral univalve shell, it is supposed to be placed with the spire uppermost and the aperture in front (see Fig. 4). The point of the spire is then the apex, and the lower part of the aperture the base. The left side of the aperture is the pillar lip or inner lip, and the right side the outer lip. At the lower part of the aperture is frequently a canal or groove, sometimes long, sometimes short, called the anterior canal; and at the upper part another, called the posterior canal: these are for the passage of the siphons for conveying water to the gills or branchiæ.

When the animal is in motion the shell is carried on its back, with the apex pointing backwards. The head and foot are protruded from the front of the aperture (which is now underneath), the respiratory or inhalent siphon issuing from the anterior canal, and the excretory or exhalent siphon from the posterior canal. The foot is expanded, and forms a large flat disk, and the mantle is spread over the lower part of the shell. On the upper part of the foot is placed the operculum, a shelly or horny plate, with which the animal closes the aperture of its shell when it retires within it.

On each side of the head are the tentacles, on which are sometimes situated the eyes; but sometimes, as in the snails and slugs, they are fixed on separate pedicels, which have a telescopic motion. Between these is placed the proboscis, which is capable of being protruded or withdrawn, and which contains in some families a retractile membrane or tongue, called the lingual ribbon. This is covered with minute teeth, and is used for rasping hard surfaces and boring holes through shells, in order to get at the animals within. The structure of the tongue in the whelk is very remarkable. (See Fig. 35.)

A bivalve shell consists as a rule of two pieces or valves, which inclose the animal, and are capable of being opened or shut. They are held together by a ligament that forms a hinge, which in many cases is further strengthened by shelly teeth, alternating and locking from one valve into the other. The tendency of the ligament is to open the valves, and they are kept closed by strong muscles, called, for that reason, adductor muscles, the impression of which appears on the inside of the shell; and the circumstance of there being one or two, divides the bivalves into two sections, the Monomyarians, or one-musclcd, and the Dimyarians, or two-musclcd. These muscles are relaxed at the will of the animal, and at its death they of course lose all power, and the ligament then acts and forces the shell open, as we generally see in dead shells.

The beak or umbo is situated on the upper or dorsal margin over the hinge, and has its point inclining forward, and the ligament posterior—never anterior to it; and by this may be known the position of the animal. The part of the shell anterior to the beak is in general much shorter than the posterior part; but in a few instances it is the contrary. The umbo is the point from which spring all circles, and from which all lines radiate.

On viewing or describing a shell, it is supposed to be placed in the same position as Fig. 23, with the hinge side uppermost, and the beak pointing forward. The ligament will then be posterior, and the terms "right valve" and "left valve," "anterior" and "posterior," will be applied to the parts in the positions as now placed. The length of the shell will be measured in the direction of the animal, that is, from anterior to posterior; the breadth from the upper or dorsal margin to the lower or ventral margin, and the thickness through the two valves when closed.

On the inside of the shell there often appears a more or less distinctly marked line or impression, which shows the line of junction of the muscular edge of the mantle and the shell, and is called the pallial impression (or line). When the animal possesses retractile siphons this line shows an indentation or bay called the pallial sinus.

One family of gasteropoda—the chitons—has a multivalve shell, formed of eight pieces, firmly fixed in a muscular border or collar, and capable of motion. The animal has the habit of fixing itself on stones like the limpet.

The characteristic organ of locomotion in the typical mollusca is the "foot" already mentioned, which may be modified so as to perform various offices. Its use in the case of the snail is well known. In the cockle it is developed to a great size, and by its aid the animal can perform considerable leaps. In some cases (as the razor-shells) it enables its possessor to burrow rapidly in the sand; while in the mussels, &c., the organ is devoted to the secretion of the well-known beard or byssus, a collection of strong fibrous threads by means of which these animals moor or fix themselves to rocks and stones. In some bivalves (as the oyster), in which the locomotive powers are in abeyance, the foot is rudimentary. In the cuttle-fishes it is represented by the arms or tentacles round the mouth.

A distinct stomach, intestine, and anus are generally to be observed in the mollusca. In many there is a masticatory apparatus consisting of an elongated lingual ribbon or odontophore, as mentioned above; and in the majority there is a well-developed liver. The blood is generally destitute of colour, and in the higher molluscs at least is circulated through the body in a system of vessels connected with a central circulatory organ or heart. The typical breathing organs consist of gills or branchiæ. In terrestrial gasteropods (as snails and slugs) we find a pulmonary-sac or lung-chamber, to which atmospheric air is admitted for the due aeration of the blood. Eyes as well as organs of touch and hearing exist in the higher mollusca. The eyes are of the most perfect structure in cuttle-fishes and gasteropods; in many forms visual organs are entirely wanting.

The Sub-Kingdom Mollusca is divided into two primary sections, the Mollusca Proper or Higher Mollusca, and the Molluscoida or Lower Mollusca. The former have a more highly developed nervous system, a distinct heart of at least two chambers, and generally a muscular foot. The latter have no specialized heart, or only a rudimentary one, and have no foot. The Mollusca Proper are divided into the following four classes: Cephalopoda, Gasteropoda, Pteropoda, and Lamellibranchiata. They may be also divided into the encephalous mollusca or those that have a distinct head, and the acephalous or headless mollusca, the latter comprising the Lamellibranchiata.

CLASS I.—CEPHALOPODA (Gr. cephalē, head, and pous, podos, foot). Cuttle-fishes, Squids, Nautilus, &c., Ammonites and other fossil forms.

Characters: Mollusca having a circle of arms or tentacles round the head, with mouth in the centre; body contained within a muscular mantle; gills two or four in number, contained within the mantle; the effete water of respiration expelled through a siphon; shell external (as in nautilus) or internal.

CLASS II.—GASTEROPODA (Gr. gaster, belly, pous, podos, foot). Land-snails, Sea-snails, Limpets, Periwinkles, Whelks, &c.; Univalves and Multivalves.

Characters: Shell in the great majority of cases univalve, sometimes multivalve, occasionally absent; locomotion effected by means of a "foot" or broad flat disc on the ventral surface of the body; head in most cases very distinct; mouth commonly with lingual ribbon or "odontophore." The order is divided into two sub-classes, according as the animals are adapted to breathe in water or in air.

Sub-class A.—BRANCHIOGASTEROPODA. Respiration aquatic, usually performed by means of gills.

Order I.—Prosobranchiata. Gills generally lodged in a branchial chamber, and situated in front of the heart (Gr. prosi, in advance); shell present, protecting the abdomen; sexes distinct. The order is divided into two sections: Siphonostomata, having the aperture of the shell notched or produced to form a sort of canal; and Holostomata, in which the aperture is rounded and free from any notch. Figs. 4 to 10 are Siphonostomata; figs. 11 to 16 are Holostomata.

Order III.—Heteropoda. Free-swimming animals; shell present or absent; swim by means of a fin-like appendage. Example, Carinaria.

Sub-Class B.—PULMONIFERA or PULMOGASTEROPODA. Respiration aerial, air being admitted into a pulmonary chamber by an external aperture. Land-snails, Slugs, Pond-snails, &c.

CLASS III.—PTEROPODA (Gr. pteron, wing, and pous, podos, foot).

Characters: Small free-swimming animals found in immense quantities on the surface of the Arctic and other seas; named from possessing two wing-like fins springing from the sides of the head, and formed by developments of the upper and lateral portions of the foot; shell, when developed, of a symmetrical shape, and of a delicate glassy consistence; breathe by gills or ciliated surfaces, or do not show any specialized respiratory apparatus; all hermaphrodite. A well-known example is the Clio, which forms the chief food of the whales in the Arctic Seas.

The above divisions comprise all the Higher Mollusca. The Lower Mollusca form three classes, the Brachiopoda, Tunicata, and Polyzoa, only the first of which resemble in form the characteristic mollusca or shell-fish with which we are familiar.

CLASS V.—BRACHIOPODA (Gr. brachiōn, arm, pous, podos, foot). Lamp-shells (so called from resembling ancient Roman lamps); mostly fossil.

Characters: Animals enclosed in a bivalve shell, the valves of which are not right and left (as in Lamelli-branchiata), but dorsal or upper and ventral or lower; mouth furnished with two long arms bearing cirri, and coiled spirally in repose; ventral valve often perforated by an orifice through which a muscular stalk or peduncle passes; ventral valve generally the larger of the two.

PALÆONTOLOGY.

CHARACTERISTIC FOSSILS OF THE CHIEF GEOLOGICAL FORMATIONS.

PALÆONTOLOGY is that department of geological science which treats of the animals and plants that existed in remote ages on the surface of the globe. It investigates the petrified or fossil remains of these animals and plants, organisms which belong, with a few exceptions, to species that have long been extinct. Geologists classify the strata containing organic remains, according to the nature and succession of their fossils, under three great epochs, or life periods, viz. Palæozoic, or ancient life period; Mesozoic, or middle life period; Kainozoic, or recent life period. The systems or formations, defined and separated by their organic characters, and representing distinct periods of time, are arranged as follows under these three epochs:—

I. PALÆOZOIC, OR PRIMARY EPOCH.	1. Cambrian.
	2. Silurian.
	3. Devonian (Old Red Sandstone).
	4. Carboniferous.
II. MESOZOIC, OR SECONDARY EPOCH.	5. Permian. { New Red Sandstone.
	6. Triassic.
	7. Jurassic, or Oolite.
	8. Chalk.
III. KAINOZOIC, OR TERTIARY EPOCH.	9. Eocene.
	10. Miocene.
	11. Pliocene.
	12. Post-Pliocene.
	13. Recent or contemporaneous era.

The accompanying Plate represents characteristic organisms of the different systems, which will be briefly referred to in their geological order.

I. ANCIENT LIFE PERIOD (Palæozoic).—The lowest and oldest stratified rocks, consisting of gneiss, mica and chlorite schists, &c., appear to be destitute of organic remains. Some geologists believe that these rocks were deposited before the creation of organized beings; others, with greater reason, are of opinion that the extreme heat to which they have been subjected, and which has rendered them highly crystalline, was sufficient to efface the vestiges of organic structure. The earliest fossils are discovered in the Cambrian and Silurian systems. In the lower beds of these systems sponges, fucoids and annelids are found; the Silurian is rich in mollusca; and the remains of fishes appear in the upper beds. The graptolite, or sea-pen (fig. 4), represents numerous zoophytes which have left their remains in the Silurian strata, not unfrequently embedded in anthracite, containing the vestiges of sea-weeds of the fucoid type, and no doubt deriving its origin from the remains of marine algæ. The lowest bed of the same system abounds with the lingula (fig. 1), one of the brachiopoda, or arm-footed class of molluscs; the upper beds contain species of Pentamerus (fig. 3), belonging to the same class, and occurring in all the strata below the carboniferous or mountain limestone. The orthoceras (fig. 5) is a chambered shell, which may be compared to a nautilus uncoiled, and represents in these primary strata the highest class of molluscan animals, namely, the cephalopoda. But the most characteristic animal of the Silurian is the trilobite, a specimen of which (Asaphus tyrannus) is shown in fig. 2, and Bronteus flabellifer (fig. 8), belonging to a family strictly of the palæozoic age, the last of the species disappearing with the carboniferous limestone. It was an articulated animal of the crustacean class, remarkable for the preservation of its eyes, which were constructed on the same plan as those of modern crustaceans and insects; in the species of Asaphus figured, the eye is computed to have consisted of 6000 distinct facets or visual surfaces, each belonging in a sense to a distinct eye. The rocks of this group contain representatives of all the great existing types of animal structure, up to the vertebrate. The system known as the Devonian, or Old Red Sandstone, is particularly characterized by the remains of fishes of complex and peculiar structure, of which the pterichthys (fig. 6), named in honour of Hugh Miller, its discoverer, may serve as an example. The fishes of that age, amongst other peculiarities, were characterized by being encased in a covering of hard, shining plates called ganoid plates, and hence their name of ganoid fishes. Reptilian remains also occur in the system; and the brachiopods are represented by Calceola sandalina (fig. 7), which is peculiar to the Devonian.—The Carboniferous or Coal System is remarkable for its wealth of vegetation, entitling the age to be pre-eminently regarded as one of plants. There are about 300 species of fossil plants in the British coal-measures alone, of which a considerable proportion are ferns (fig. 11) of various species, probably arborescent; calamites (fig. 12), reed-like plants, usually found compressed; lepidodendra, huge trees, seemingly allied to our comparatively tiny club-mosses; and sigillaria and stigmara (fig. 10), the former the stem and the latter the creeping-roots or rhizomes of trees to which no living plant bears any close affinity. Nearly the same species prevail throughout all the coal-fields of the world, and the above may be considered as having contributed the greatest part of the woody matter, which, under the influence of heat, pressure, and chemical action, has been converted into coal. The coal-measures contain fresh-water or estuary shells (Anthrocosia, Anthrocoma, &c.) A few reptilian (saurian) remains have been yielded by the system, together with several insects. The subordinate rocks of the carboniferous or mountain limestone, an eminently marine portion of the system, are rich in brachiopod shells, of which the Productus giganteus (fig. 13) and Spirifer striatus (fig. 14) are examples. In the same productive limestones there are numerous representatives of the lamellibranchiate class of molluscs (to which the modern mussel and oyster belong); of the gasteropods, or belly-footed class (like the whelk and limpet); there are numerous species of Euomphalus (fig. 9), of Bellerophon (fig. 15), and various genera of cephalopods, the principal of which are Goniatites (fig. 16), Nautilus, and Orthoceras. Many species of fish, powerful and predaceous, have been described.—The Permian System is not profuse in fossils. Of its fishes, the genus Paleoniscus (fig. 18) combines with rhomboid scales, a heterocercal tail, in which the vertebral column is prolonged into the upper lobe. Schizodus (fig. 17) is one of the lamellibranchiate molluscs of the Permian. Amphibia and reptiles are also among the fossils of this system.

II. MIDDLE LIFE PERIOD (Mesozoic).—The transition is broadly marked betwixt the Palæozoic and Mesozoic life periods. The latter is introduced by the Triassic System, containing fossils more nearly related to the newer rocks above than to those of the older formations below. Foot-prints of a huge batrachian or frog-like animal, named labyrinthodon (fig. 19), have been discovered in the rocks of the system in Cheshire, in Dumfriesshire, in Saxony, and on the Connecticut river in America. In the Triassic rocks at Würtemberg the remains of a mammalian marsupial animal, named Microlestes antiquus, have been detected, being the earliest discovered mammalian relic hitherto recorded.—The Oolitic and Liasic System indicates an age of reptiles. Upwards of thirty species of ichthyosaurus, or fish-lizard (fig. 23), have been discovered. It has been described as possessing a porpoise's snout, a crocodile's teeth, a lizard's head, a fish's vertebra, and a whale's paddles. The animal's eye was of great magnitude. The plesiosaurus (fig. 24), a contemporary of the former saurian, had a lizard's head, a crocodile's teeth, a neck of extraordinary length, and a trunk and tail having the proportions of one of the larger quadrupeds. the ribs of a chameleon, and the paddles of a whale. The pterodactyle

(fig. 25), a winged reptile, was suited to fly in the air or swim in the water. In the Lias, the cephalopod class of molluscs is largely represented by ammonites (fig. 22), belemnites, and nautili. The Gryphaea incurv (fig. 20) exhibits the graceful form of one of the oysters of the age; and Avicula cygnipes (fig. 21) is a pearl-oyster. The deep-bodied fish, Dapedius politus (fig. 19a), is one of the numerous fishes of the system. The Stonesfield slate overlying the Lias has revealed the jaw-bones of several species of small insectivorous marsupial animals, of which Phascolotherium Bucklandi (fig. 28), a small insectivorous marsupial, is an example. The Oolite deposits contain numerous bivalve shell-fish, such as pectens, oysters, &c. To the bivalve class also belongs Trigonia costata (fig. 26), of which genus a hundred species are known in the secondary rocks. Species of terebratula, or lamp-shell (figs. 27 and 30), are still conspicuous amongst the declining class of brachiopods. The lower Oolite abounds with gasteropods, including the genus Purpuroidea or Purpurina (fig. 29), an extinct member of the whelk family. The Oxford clay, still higher in the series, is remarkable for the recurrence of many ammonites and belemnites (fig. 31), the latter name being assigned to a family of extinct cuttle-fishes of the secondary period. The Oolite contains considerable deposits of coal, which have been profitably wrought in several instances. Figs. 32, 33, 34 are representatives of the fresh-water shells of the upper Oolite. The same rocks have recently yielded mammalian remains; some marsupial, others placental. The Chalk System overlies the Oolite, the fresh-water beds of the Wealden occupying an intermediate place betwixt them. These latter deposits contain fresh-water shells, such as belong to the genera Paludina (fig. 35) and Cypris (fig. 36). But the characteristic fossils of the Wealden are saurian reptiles of extraordinary dimensions—the megalosaurus, hyelosaurus, iguanodon, &c. Overlying the Wealden beds is the lower Greensand, amongst the fossils of which are many echinoderms allied to the sea-urchin (for example Salenia punctata, fig. 37); and a distinctive molluscan form is Perna mulleti (fig. 38). The Gault clay, another deposit subordinate to the Chalk, contains the genera Turritites and Hamites (fig. 39), species of cephalopods allied to the ammonite. The Chalk formation is marked by unambiguous characters; its structure is uniform, and its organisms are eminently marine, consisting of sponges, corals, echinoderms, molluscs, crustaceans, fishes, and saurian reptiles. Amongst the echinoderms are species of Galerites (fig. 40) and Nucleolites (fig. 41), associated with which are numerous star-fishes, including an extinct species belonging to the existing genus Goniaster (G. Coombii, fig. 42). The brachiopodous molluscs are represented by rhynchonellæ (fig. 43) and terebratulæ; belonging to the ammonite alliance are Turritites (fig. 44), Baculites, and Scaphites (fig. 45). The system contains about 800 species of animals, with traces of sea-weeds.

III. TERTIARY LIFE PERIOD (Kainozoic).—In this period the forms of animals and plants gradually approximate towards those of existing genera; and the formations of this last great geological epoch have been classified in accordance with the greater or less resemblance of their contained organisms to those of living nature. The Eocene group (Gr. ēos, dawn, kainos, recent) represents the dawn of the existing flora and fauna. Its plants are exemplified by the fruits of tropical palms, such as Nipadites (fig. 46), found in the island of Sheppey. The London clay has yielded an instructive suite of fossils of the age. Many of the molluscs have a tropical aspect; in the fluvio-marine deposits of Hampshire and the Isle of Wight occur such instances of this character as Voluta spinosa (fig. 47), Fusus porrectus (fig. 48), Oliva Branderi (fig. 49), and Nummulites lavigata (fig. 50). Fresh-water beds of the time contain Planorbis euomphalus (fig. 51). In associated strata are obtained Paludina lenta (fig. 52), Limnaea longiscuta (fig. 53), and several other fresh-water and brackish-water species. The Eocene rocks near Paris produced nearly fifty extinct species of mammalian animals, which were described by Cuvier; they were chiefly pachyderms, or thick-hided animals, as the palæotherium, anoplo-therium, &c. Fossil birds were detected in the same formation.—The Miocene (Gr. meion, less), containing a higher proportion of living species than the previous group, abounds in the remains of the elephant, rhinoceros, bears, and numerous other quadrupeds.—The Pliocene (Gr. pleion, more) makes a still greater advance towards the present state of nature. Of its numerous mollusca a considerable proportion now live in British seas; and one of the most characteristic of these is Fusus contrarius (fig. 54). Skates and sharks have left their teeth in the same formation; fig. 55 represents the tooth of a shark (Carcharodus megalodon). The bones of whales also occur, including the ear-bone (fig. 56), together with a profusion of animal exuviae, now employed in the manufacture of manure.—The Post-Pliocene group belongs to the geological era immediately preceding the existing age. The deposits point to the prevalence of an arctic climate in many parts of Europe and America, and the traces of ice-action are frequent in the British Islands. To floating glaciers, or to a current of water flowing from north-west to south-east, have been ascribed the enormous deposits of drifted matter, containing boulders or rolled stones. To the descent of glaciers in valleys are assigned the grooved and polished surfaces of rocks observed in mountainous districts, and particularly in the Highlands of Scotland. In the beds of the drift are found the bones of the Elephas primigenius, or mammoth (fig. 57); the remains of this animal being widely dispersed over Europe, Asia, and North America. To the post-glacial age belongs the Irish elk (fig. 58), which has left its remains in Ireland, Scotland, England, and France. Among its contemporaries were the reindeer, oxen, beaver, wolves, &c. It only remains to be stated that, associated with the drift or boulder clay, are marine beds, first observed in the valley of the Clyde, containing several shells which now only exist alive in arctic seas. The shells found in the raised beaches seen on our shores are exclusively of existing species.
